be the connection of his music with all this life. But though practically every musical work of any emotional value must start from this basis, the connection of it with the external world or with the symbols of the literary and plastic arts may range through many degrees of vagueness or precision, according to the psychological build of the composer. Many of us, declining to be tied down to any à priori æsthetics against the judgment of our own senses, keep our minds hospitably open to all these types of music, and decline, for example, to turn up the whites of our eyes at first-rate music, such as 'Till Eulenspiegel' or 'Don Quixote,' simply because it has been written to a programme. But when a composer's mind does not work on these lines, we can understand his anxiety to prevent unauthorised programmes being read into his music. Elgar's new Symphony, then, is not written upon any programme. The only clue he will give us as to some of the moods in which it had birth is the quotation of the first two lines of Shelley's 'Invocation':

Rarely, rarely comest thou,
Spirit of Delight;

though anyone who tries to correlate the Symphony as a whole with that poem as a whole will find himself baffled. The dominant tone of the poem is one of despondency, merging into hope at the end; the speaker is a man regretting that he is now too rarely visited by the old, pure delight of soul. The prevailing note of the Symphony, on the other hand, is joyousness,—though this mood, of course, has to submit to various temperings. The music seems to correspond most closely with the last four stanzas of the poem, in which Shelley speaks of his love for 'all that thou lovest, Spirit of Delight,'—the fresh earth, the starry night, the autumn evening, the golden morn, the snow, the waves, winds and storms, and 'tranquil solitude,' and Love itself, and finally

... Above other things,
Spirit, I love thee—
Thou art love and life! O come!
Make once more my heart thy own.

The Symphony will be found to offer a complete psychological contrast to the earlier one. It is untroubled by any of the darker problems of the soul. For the most part it sings and dances in sheer delight with life; and even in the beautiful slow movement, thoughtful as it is, there is nothing of the tense, nervous emotion of the Adagio of the first Symphony. The work will, I think, be found particularly enjoyable just by reason of this prevalent spirit of gladness. Our greater music has worn the tragic mask long enough; it is good to have it break into a smile occasionally. Laughter is almost impossible, apparently, to our younger men; they are lost without their 'customary suits of solemn black,' and 'windy suspiration of forced breath.' We have to get towards the autumn of life before we see the full meaning and beauty of the spring, as Wagner's Hans Sachs very wisely points out to the impatient young Walther.

In point of form, the first movement of the new Symphony proceeds much on the lines of Elgar's other first movements; there are two well-defined chief subject-groups, the first main idea especially being built up of a number of motives that can be used collectively or individually; while further varieties of mood are obtained by means of striking episodes. The Allegro begins (Vivace e nobilmente) without preamble, with the first principal theme,—a vigorous melody in E flat:

EX. 1.

There is no regular 'motto' theme as in the first Symphony; but particular note should be taken of the descending phrase in the third bar of the above quotation, which is put to some expressive uses, both in this and the later movements.

The theme runs on for some time in the same glad way. Though it is really the expression of a single continuous idea, extending as far as the entry of the second subject in bar 47, for the purposes of analysis three sub-themes may be disengaged from it, the first entering at the ninth bar:

the second at bar 13:

(this last is perhaps the most delightful, heart-easing motive in the Symphony; each time it recurs it brings with it a sense of sunlight and sweet country things); and the third at bar 27:

This exhilarating and richly-scored opening is soon succeeded by the second of the subject-groups, which opens with a graceful and charming melody, given first of all mainly to the strings and harps:

EX. 5. pp espress. legato.

The orchestration becomes fuller as the lissom theme proceeds; later on, too, a counter-subject is heard with it. Then comes what the composer wishes to be regarded as the principal second subject (dolce e delicato):

Ex 6. dolce e delicato.

Viole.
Bassi. pizz.
Fag.

though its characteristic droop (see bars 2, 4, &c.) plainly makes it a variant of the figure to which attention has already been called (bar 3 of No. 1); while the little accompaniment figure in the violas reminds us somewhat of No. 3.

Further developments of the pliant, swaying melody quoted as No. 5 lead to a resumption of the earlier and more vigorous matter, which is worked up impetuously to a climax, in which a modification of No. 6 figures largely.

This ends the first section of the movement. The second—what would be called, in the orthodox form, the working-out section—is wholly concerned with modifications of the first-subject matter and with some highly interesting episodes. A new and less sunny cast, however, has come over the old themes. All this section, in fact, is like a darker inset in the centre of an otherwise bright picture. The harmonies have grown more mysterious; the scoring is more veiled; the dynamics are all on a lower scale (the range of tone never rises above piano, while pp and ppp are the general markings). The whole effect ought to be most striking on the orchestra. First of all No. 2 is passed through some modifications that give it a remote and clouded air. It is answered by a reminiscence of No. 6, greatly attenuated now, however, the flute, oboe, and harps giving out the sustained note in the faintest of tones, while the answering figure beneath is played softly by the muted violins (afterwards by the violas). Then comes an enigmatic phrase in the muted strings:

Ex 7.

Vi.
Corni con pp sord.
dim.

that runs through virtually the whole of this section. It is impossible, as it would be useless, to analyse the scene in detail on paper. Its ghostly colour, the throbbing drum-notes, and the strange, faint clashing of tonalities in it (a pedal E, for example, supporting E flat and D harmonies), make it, one anticipates, as subtly imaginative a piece of work as Elgar has ever written; and one looks forward with the greatest curiosity to hearing it on the orchestra.

Towards the end of this section the material of the commencement (Nos. 1, 2, and 4) re-appears in expressive forms, though in much subdued colours. In this way a transition is made to the final section, in which the first-subject matter is again heard in all its former exuberance. The key is the same as before—E flat; but when the theme No. 5 recurs, it is in the key of F major, i.e., simply a tone lower than formerly. (These, it should be said, are merely the keys in which the theme begins; as it proceeds it passes through so many that it is hard to say of it as a whole that it is in any particular key. On the present occasion, for example, it is repeated in D flat in a very few bars.) No. 6, which follows, is also a tone lower than before. The prevailing mood now is healthy and animated. Just before the close we get a suggestion of the quieter atmosphere of the middle section, the lovely No. 3 being repeated in softer colours; but gradually the old spirit reasserts itself, and the movement ends in an exhilarating burst of energy. The finish should be highly effective. Seven bars from the end we hear the familiar motive of the opening theme (bar 3, No. 1) in a double fortissimo. In the next two bars it is given out slowly in augmentation, commencing pp and swelling out to fff again within a single bar. The last three bars are a brilliant fantasia upon the single chord of E flat; the effect should be dazzling.

The slow movement (Larghetto, C minor) commences with a series of softly-breathed chords in the strings:

Ex. 8. Viole & VI. II.

that set us at once in a much remoter and less active world than that of the Allegro. At the eighth bar we hear the main theme—a grave, deliberate melody in flutes, clarinets, horns, trumpets, and trombones (ppp), over an accompaniment of chords on the second and fourth beat of each bar:

Ex. 9.

It has a broadly and richly harmonized central section, after which No. 9 is resumed, while an echo of No. 8 rounds off the whole. Then comes a new and beautiful passage. The cor anglais (above) and the oboe give out a sweet, wistful melody in thirds, which is at once repeated by the clarinets:

Cor Anglais.

This merges into a quiet, meditative theme in the strings alone (with wind added later):

Ex. 11. VI.

The characteristic fall of the melody here (see bars 2, 4, &c.) is that of the figure in bar 3 of No. 1, which plays so large a part in the Symphony. There follow some pages of the greatest interest from the orchestral point of view, but quite impossible to describe in words; these are succeeded by a fresh theme:

Ex. 12.

that well answers to its marking of Nobilmente e semplice. In bar 4 and elsewhere will be seen again the melodic progression of No. 1, bar 3.

This constitutes virtually the whole of the thematic material of the Larghetto. All of it is now repeated, in still more beautiful forms and colours, the details of which it would take far too much space to describe. The many changes of mood are extremely eloquent; after a statement of No. 12, for example, in the most gorgeous tints, there is a gradual transition to the gentle, plaintive No. 10. Near the end the vital phrase of the whole Symphony (No. 1, bar 3) steals in quietly in two solo violas, and then in the violins, but only for three or four bars; the last word is given to the grave No. 9 and the tenuous No. 8.

As has been said already, what most people would call the Scherzo is here styled a Rondo. Its main theme (presto) is full of quips and surprises:

(One feature of the Symphony, by the way, is the number of themes that run in thirds. See, for example, among those quoted in this article, Nos. 2, 3, 7, 10, 13.) After this theme has run its nimble course, another comes bounding out in the strings and cor anglais in unison (accompaniment in horns, bassoons, trombones, and contrabassi):

On its repetition later, it is combined with a counter-melody:

After this come some lively metamorphoses of the sprightly No. 13, combined with other matter, of which it is possible to quote here only one of the recurring figures:

which generally enters in a curiously detached, independent kind of way.

With a change to the key of D major we enter upon a long, smoothly-flowing passage mostly for the strings alone, into which No. 16 keeps on interjecting itself in the most unexpected ways. The whole passage, though agreeable from the purely musical standpoint, still puzzles one slightly; one feels that the composer must be in the possession of some psychological key to it, in the absence of which it is not wholly clear to the outside mind. So, indeed, with some later stages of the Rondo, particularly the very remarkable passage that follows almost immediately afterwards, in which a strangely formed theme, which has already been heard as a counter-subject to No. 7 in the first movement, is given out by the violins and 'cellos in double octaves against uniformly reiterated, almost rhythmless chords, the whole being posed upon a pedal bass. The passage commences pianissimo, but soon works up to a tremendous torrent of sound in the full orchestra. The harmonies suggest at times those of Example No. 7, the characteristic melodic feature of which also appears, becoming more and more pronounced as the passage draws to a quiet close. Altogether this strange and powerful episode, occurring as it does in the middle of a Rondo seemingly given up to the pure joy of motion, will give us something to think about when we hear it. We shall probably not understand it all at first. The remainder of the brilliant Rondo, with its repetitions of Nos. 13, 14, &c., is quite plain sailing. Here and there we believe we catch veiled reminiscences of the ubiquitous bar 3 of No. 1 (in some of the transformations of No. 16, for example),—though this may be merely an analyst's fancy.

The Finale raises no such tantalising problems as the Rondo does. The main theme tells its own story at once:

It is first of all given out in strong lines by bass clarinet, bassoons, horns and cellos, broken harmonies being supplied by clarinets, harps and second violins. A few repetitions of it in various forms serve to imprint it firmly on our memories before a second theme comes,—mainly in the strings:

Large use is made of the second part of it, commencing at bar 3 of the quotation. A third theme:

is of a similarly broad and dignified character. Then, in quickened tempo, No. 18 is worked out quasi-fugally, along with some other figures, in a bold and effective style; after which we make our way back to the captivating No. 17 again, which is treated in a variety of ways, being combined, for example, with the opening bars of No. 18, and with other counterpoints. The climax comes with a sonorous reiteration of No. 19, the sequences mounting one on the other like great waves. Then a più tranquillo passage based on No. 17 leads us to a quiet and expressive reminiscence of bar 3 of No. 1 in extended notes:

It is made the text of a masterly peroration, not so overpowering in its wealth of tone as the ending of the first Symphony, but equally effective in its much quieter way, and exhibiting the same consummate knowledge of the art of getting off the stage. The phrase is repeated several times in one instrument after another, then breaks off into a reminiscence of a fine phrase that has been heard in some of the later developments of No. 19; and finally we hear an echo of No. 17. All this time the motion has been growing more tranquil and the tone more subdued. Up to almost the last moment we are in a pianissimo, and apart from one short crescendo, in a couple of discords that are quickly resolved, it is pianissimo that we end, in a mood of calm but profound content.

Somewhere in the 'Oxford History of Music' Professor Wooldridge speaks of 'jocundity and sweetness' as being the characteristics of the best English music from the earliest times. 'Jocundity and sweetness'—no two words could better describe the main qualities of this second Symphony of Elgar's.

CAN MUSICAL CRITICISM BE TAUGHT?

By M. D. CALVOCORESSI.

All music-lovers should be thankful to Mr. Ernest Newman for his article, 'A school for musical critics' (Musical Times, January, 1911), in which he raises a vital and much-neglected question. It appears incredible, not only that a musical critic should be allowed to launch into his career without having received befitting education, but that such education should be impossible to acquire otherwise than at random and by dint of great initiative and pains. Yet such is the state of things. It may have been tolerable at the time (not very ancient) when there was little demand for musical criticism, and when high-class musical criticism hardly existed. But this being no longer the case, the problem of supplying the would-be critic with means to acquire a professional education becomes all-important and requires prompt solution.

In 1894, Dr. Braddon (Westminster Review, November) suggested that an examination should be instituted for professional musical critics, but without going deep into fundamental points. And, as far as I know, practical teaching of musical criticism has been attempted for the first time at the Berlin Seminar für Musik, at its Director's suggestion, by Dr. W. Altmann.*

* See Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, February 3, 1904. W. Altmann: 'Kritik, ein Fach des musikalischen Unterrichts.' From this article the tuition alluded to appears to be chiefly empirical, consisting only in the discussion of papers written as tasks.

At the Paris Ecole des Hautes Etudes Sociales, also, attempts have been made to fill the gap—at least, partly. About seven years ago a ‘Course of musical criticism’ was delivered there by Mr. Hellouin, and since 1908 the present writer has delivered monthly lectures, consisting in applied criticism on new works recently produced.

Given the will to teach the art of criticising, it remains to find the way. Many will deem it doubtful whether criticism, being altogether a matter of keen and personal discernment, can be taught at all. When musical criticism is concerned, the case becomes even more difficult and perplexing, for all matters appertaining to the aesthetics of music are yet in their infancy. To what extent can the afore-mentioned lessons, or lessons founded on similar plans, be useful; and is there a reliable way of teaching criticism?

Criticism is set at a fundamental disadvantage as soon as it confronts a modern work. Whilst granting, with Mr. Newman, that ‘a critic may be as right about a symphony of to-day as about a Beethoven symphony,’ one cannot ignore the fact that it is very difficult for him and for his readers to know whether he is right. Mr. Herbert Antcliffe (Musical Times, March, 1911) judiciously questions the possibility of having a full knowledge of contemporary works; one might add that it is by no means easy to discard the prejudices of the time, so as to view new works clearly and dispassionately.

That is the reason why I suggested a distinction between opinions and statements of mere facts, a distinction on which I strive to found the course of tuition alluded to. All the ‘tens of thousands of æsthetic judgments in which every one agrees,’ as Mr. Newman says, refer to works of the past. They are right opinions, i.e., converted by persistent and concurrent approval into accepted truths, and henceforth endowed with the authority of facts. But they are not facts in the proper sense of the word. A fact is what can be demonstrated; it is not the result of critical judgment, but may be its cause. When a critic asserts, for instance, that a work is beautiful, he merely expresses an opinion, which time may convert into an accepted truth, but which nobody is bound to take for granted; whereas certain assertions—like this one: ‘such a work is well (or badly) constructed’—are statements of fact that any competent person can pronounce accurate or false. My suggestion is that the critic, and especially the beginner, should always keep in mind the distinction, so as to guard himself against dogmatism and hasty or unjustifiable judgments, and so as not to mislead unsuspicious readers.

The distinction also affords a test of the value of criticism. In his book on Rossini, Stendhal asserts that in the Darkness scene of ‘Moses’ is displayed ‘science in conjunction with an abundance of fancy well fit to startle the good Germans.’ M. de la Laurencie (‘Le goût musical en France,’ p. 13), alluding to this critical judgment, simply remarks that the ‘abundance of fancy’ consists merely in twenty-six repetitions of one design. Here is plain fact, speaking for itself, which no opinion can gainsay.

By thus perpetually sifting his ideas and the vocabulary in which he expresses them, the critic will find himself more at ease, and avoid many of the pitfalls that result from the deplorable vagueness of critical terminology. His teacher should show him that, upon the whole, any critical judgment can be analysed either as a fact or as an opinion.

This, of course, is only the embryo of a method, a sort of preparatory discipline. The pupil critic should now be taught how to cull facts, to discern and to weigh their import. He should be helped to train his perceptive, emotional and intellectual faculties; to cultivate his receptiveness and his taste, on which his opinions are founded, and to discern the connection between these opinions and certain facts—thus discovering the true key to sound criticism. He should learn not to undervalue the responsibilities and duties of his calling, but also to understand his proper position, which a writer in the Edinburgh Review (October, 1906) has most aptly defined thus: ‘The true critic is simply the most enlightened listener; not standing aloof with a manual of arrogant imperatives, but taking his place among us to stimulate our attention where it falters, and to supplement our knowledge where it is deficient. His position is not to command, but to interpret.’

This alone necessitates a thorough training of the mind, to be acquired through steady discipline of thought. The teacher can but call attention to it and give general advice, leaving the rest with the pupil. The same may be said of the culture of receptiveness and taste; but the other branches of the critic’s education (viz., culture of perceptiveness, of science, and acquirement of a practical method) come within the immediate scope of tuition.

Wordsworth, in his Letter to Lady Beaumont, remarks that ‘every great and original writer, in proportion as he is great or original, must himself create the taste by which he is to be relished; he must teach the art by which he is to be seen.’ This shows that every work of art creates and contains in itself all the æsthetic principles by which it is governed. To discover and to expound these laws is the critic’s chief duty. But this is rendered arduous by prejudices of all kinds that too often stand in the way of investigation and comprehension. Except the over-eclectic, who by nature are absolutely unfit to become critics, all of us, even when resolved not to be dogmatic, have certain sympathies and antipathies founded on some particular bias. Or, as Mr. Newman appropriately puts it, ‘at the back of apparently the most instinctive judgment lies a general principle of some kind. What we seek in a work of art may or may not be what its creator has sought; therefore a criticism may happen to be founded on 'a taste, an art,' other than the taste and art created by the composer. The critic should strive to avoid such errors, but will fail in many cases; he errs if he believes himself free from prejudice, and if he attempts to persuade his public that he is, he may be said unwittingly to deceive. The only possible redress is that the critic's starting-point be steady and made evident,* so as to account for eventual divergencies. Thus, his work will be more easily accomplished and its ultimate value will be greater.

As to the method by which pupils can be taught to discern the general principles underlying their own work, and to proceed to consequences knowingly, I was particularly glad in finding that Mr. Newman recommended the very one that is now used at the Ecole des Hautes Etudes Sociales, viz., the holding of a court of inquiry into the causes of the discrepancy of critical opinion upon new works. All the principal accounts and criticisms issued after first performances are read and compared, care being taken to render the starting-point of each conspicuous. Then comes, as a natural sequel, the discussion of the starting-points—involving many a ramble through the dangerous regions of pure æsthetics—and of the connections between the principles implicitly or explicitly professed and the actual judgments. This is the more practical part of each lesson, devoted to applied æsthetics and to the acquirement, not of a particular method, but of method.

Beyond that point it is difficult to go, at a public school where the pupils are mere listeners and do not accomplish exercises nor exhibit tasks. Proper practical training can only be given in private, and, I believe, to not more than two or three pupils at a time. Then the pupils may be requested to write accounts, which shall be analysed like the model accounts of experienced critics. But a complete scheme of education—of which I shall venture to give a brief outline devised for the benefit of a private pupil—should include many other matters.

The course of studies divides itself into two branches, the first comprising history of music and musicians (schools, periods, forms, styles, works, taste) and erudition—my chief aim being to show the pupil how to find and select sources of information, how to use books of reference, &c.; the second, technical science, but not as taught to a would-be composer. A critic need not be able to write a fugue, nor to plan a symphony, nor to orchestrate. But of all technical subjects he should have a knowledge profound and to the point. Perceptiveness of musical matter and form, the power to analyse promptly, broadly, and accurately, are to him the most necessary attainments. These studies necessitate many practical exercises in listening, reading, recalling, &c. The teacher should dwell comparatively little on harmony and counterpoint, but lay great stress on rhythm and rhythmical analysis (combined with harmonic analysis) as a key to the proper understanding of idiom and architecture.

At all times the teacher's general aim should be to show his pupil how opinions are formed; to teach him to inquire deeply into accepted or 'authoritative' opinions, but never blindly to adhere to them, and to study no less attentively his own opinions, so as to discover how each one points to the general principles that he follows.

The pupil should receive from his teacher as many scraps as possible of that wisdom that a critic only acquires by long and often sad experience; learn not to be a laudator temporis acti, but also not to extol all that is new. To-day's absurdities may become the truth of to-morrow, as history shows; but young enthusiasts sometimes think that because a thing appears absurd it will necessarily be that truth of to-morrow which the critic is expected to foretell. But in such matters, once again, the teacher can do little except warn. He should nevertheless advise his pupil to read the criticisms of past times, so as to see how masterpieces have been disparaged, men of genius misunderstood and inferior works overrated. Such reading, though sometimes discouraging, is wholesome, and will teach the pupil to keep an open mind and to fear rashness. It will also show him that no critic can hope always to meet the truth when discussing contemporary art.

Lastly come all the directions for the writing of articles or books, including advice about scope, plan, tone, diction, &c., with reference to the requirements of the publication or public for which they are intended. This part of the professional critic's education—by no means the easiest to acquire—can be given only by a professional critic; whereas for all the rest it is perhaps not absolutely necessary—but yet desirable—that the teacher should actually have practised the craft.

After having followed this course of education, the pupil will find himself prepared to do his best, and also to go unaided into such particular points as may have been overlooked by a teacher assuredly no more infallible than any of his fellow-men. So that he may well hope for the best.

The Harrow School Musical Society gave a concert on March 30. The programme consisted entirely of compositions by the following boys in the school: G. C. Davis, G. M. Maver, L. C. Mandleberg, M. G. Davidson, K. R. Bull, B. L. T. Foster, V. K. Goodwin, A. Goulet, and J. R. Lewis.

A dinner to Mr. Dan Godfrey has been arranged to take place at the Criterion Restaurant, on May 15. The committee consists of Sir A. C. Mackenzie, Sir Hubert Parry, Sir Charles Stanford, Sir Edward Elgar, Mr. F. H. Cowen, and Mr. Edward German.

*Of course, even when the critic ignores, or purposely omits to make clear his starting-point, he may be found out; for certain sympathies or antipathies, certain other sympathies and antipathies may safely be deduced. For instance, and to quote only the crudest of examples, an admirer of Debussy is likely to admire Moussorgsky, and to have no particular fondness for Reger or Mahler. The true pupil-critic should always remark, as it leads to unequivocal results.

Occasional Notes.

As recently stated in our columns, the centenary of the establishment of the House of Novello & Co. occurs this year. A special supplement giving a brief history of the firm will be issued with our June number.

Messrs. Novello & Co. are authorized by H.M. Stationery Office to prepare in book form the music to be performed at the Coronation in Westminster Abbey. In conjunction with Messrs. Eyre & Spottiswoode, they will also prepare the musical edition of the Forms of Prayer commended by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York for general use on the day of the Coronation.

The following letter from Sir Edward Elgar appeared in the London Press on March 28:

During the summer very many local festivities will be organized in connection with the Coronation, and at most of these celebrations music, in some form or other, will occupy an important place. In arranging dates, other than the public holidays officially appointed, organizers of fêtes in former years of jubilee have endeavoured to avoid clashing with their neighbours' festivities, when caterers, tent and marquee makers, and other useful persons have had to be considered.

I ask for the same consideration for British orchestral players and British bandmen. During the past twelve months times have not been too prosperous for many of our players, and I trust as many engagements as possible will be found for British musicians; it will be understood that I venture to make this plea only on behalf of the rank and file. The above plain and simple sentences should not be construed so as to convey any affront to foreign musicians. These gentlemen know that we shall continue to welcome them warmly whenever they give us something better than we have, or something we have not; it is possible we may have been at times a little exuberant in our welcome under circumstances less accurately defined.

Mr. Landon Ronald added his weight to the plea in a letter to The Times, of which we quote a portion:

The sentiments expressed in Sir Edward Elgar's letter to you in to-day's issue of The Times can be but those of every one who has the interest of the British musician at heart.

The acknowledged supremacy of the British orchestral player needs no comment, because it is admitted by every great conductor visiting this country.

The first annual report of the Organists' Benevolent League, founded in 1909 with the object of giving relief to deserving organists who are in distress, or to those dependent on them, reveals a satisfactory financial state, by virtue of which over £120 has been distributed. At a meeting held on February 18, the President, Sir Frederick Bridge, said:

I desire to remind you of my expressed hope for the support of at least 500 contributors, and to point out what would have been the result of the fulfilment of that hope, considering that the present satisfactory position has been attained by the efforts of about only one fifth of that number, so far as recitals, &c., are concerned. So that I am yet not altogether satisfied. I look forward to a great increase of help in this direction, because I desire it to be understood that, as embodied in the resolution which I have read, 'the basis on which the League rests is an appeal to Organists to contribute an Organ Recital, &c.,' and that therefore we do not desire annual subscriptions or donations.

During the subsequent discussion, he emphasized the desire of the League that help should be the outcome of personal effort in the form of recitals, rather than personal gifts of money, although the latter are not rejected. We are sure universal commendation will be given to this desire, as well as sympathy for the objects of the League. The treasurer is Dr. H. A. Harding, the secretary, Mr. T. Shindler, and the address the Royal College of Organists, Kensington Gore, S.W.

The annual performance of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion at St. Paul's Cathedral on April 11 provoked the following comment in The Times:

The whole space of the Cathedral is crammed with attentive hearers, of whom many stand the whole time, and among whom there prevails a silence that might be envied by those who frequent secular concerts. If any refutation were needed of the silly parrot-cry that we are not a musical nation it is surely to be found here, for the attraction is simply the sublimity of the highest music that man has conceived, and the idea that it is 'above the heads of the people at large' is not to be entertained here for a moment. It never was a very cogent argument for doing inferior music, but the results of such sights as this should be to encourage those who desire to raise the general level of the cathedral and church music all the year through.

The Pall Mall Gazette put a different but equally comforting interpretation upon the event:

A critic to-day draws the conclusion from this great spectacle that we are a musical nation after all. It would, perhaps, be safer to deduce from it that we are a serious nation. Possibly, however, it is a little excessive to draw even that conclusion from the gravity of ten thousand men and women of London listening in a noble church to a beautiful rendering of some of the noblest music ever written. Yet it is, we believe, a fact that every cathedral in the country could witness a similar sight were the example of St. Paul's generally followed, as it should be. There has been a great deal of frivolity and nonsense among the English people during the last few years. Such a sight as that of last night points, we hope, to a return to the old seriousness over serious things.

We are content to derive satisfaction from the evidence both of seriousness and of musical taste.

It is not an uncommon thing to hear that high-class concert-series in the country do not pay their way. The London Philharmonic in recent years has had to call upon its guarantors to the extent of some hundreds of pounds. But how insignificant this seems when compared with the loss of £7,000 which it is stated was incurred by the New York symphony concerts this season! They like doing things on a magnificent scale in the States. From Paris, too, we have (in the Daily Telegraph) a mournful account of the finances of the Grand Opera. The budget runs as follows:

Receipts: State subvention, £32,000; subscribers, £48,000; takings, £66,800; various, £18,200; total, £165,000; expenditure, £168,620.

A loss of £4,000 is written off on account of the floods. But where would the Opera be without the State subsidy? ('Opera flourishes on the Continent,' they say.)

Mr. E. Gatty writes: 'There is a kind of intolerant patriotic spirit, that, not content with preserving national characteristics of the present, endeavours to make good what it conceives to be the errors of the past. If it cannot confute the facts of history, it will at least try to ignore them, and so surround itself with an atmosphere of unimpeachable purity. On the other hand, there is a gentler temper of mind, that accepts with equanimity these irrevocable facts and does not feel a wounded vanity in their contemplation. An example of this first touchy spirit is easily to be found in the Germany of to-day, where the language purists try to eliminate every word of foreign origin, or, where they conceive this to be impossible, substitute a "national" for a foreign spelling, as in the monstrosity "Büro" for "Bureau." The art of music has also felt the same influence, and Richard Wagner has carried out the principle with commendable thoroughness, sternly banishing every "welsch" word from his scores. He was not the first of his countrymen, however, in this direction, for even Beethoven proposed to substitute "Klangstück" for "sonata"; and though Robert Schumann rightly rejected this and the ridiculous "Bardiet" for "Symphony," yet he allowed "Werk 1" to supplant "Opus 1."

He adds: 'But there are several reasons for condemning these efforts of the extremists. Their attitude argues a kind of ill-bred gaucherie, like that of a nouveau riche, who is ashamed of his origin; and an art cannot be said to have arrived at all-round perfection when we find it behaving like a clown. Then again, artistic values and artistic estimates are so largely dependent on historical comparison, that anything tending to obscure the process is to be regretted. The fact that our modern music has an Italian origin is one of supreme importance for the historian, and the reasonable musician working with Italian names and terms of expression is glad to have around him these witnesses of the story of his art. Lastly, music is in its nature so international that the desirability of all nations using the same language for their musical terms will be obvious to every impartial mind.'

INTERNATIONAL MUSICAL CONGRESS

(LONDON, MAY 29 TO JUNE 3.)

The detailed prospectus of this important event (the first of its kind to be held in this country) can now be obtained on application to the honorary secretaries, 160, Wardour Street, London, W.

Below we give a succinct statement of the leading features of the organization, and of the arrangements for the Congress.

THE INTERNATIONAL MUSICAL SOCIETY.

The Congress is in the first instance promoted by the Society which has held similar international meetings at Leipsic (1904), Basle (1906), and Vienna (1909).

The Society has sections in all the chief countries of the world. It issues a journal monthly, and a larger journal quarterly. Sir Alexander Mackenzie is at present the president of the British section, he having succeeded Sir Hubert Parry in 1909. He is also president of the whole Society, and Dr. Maclean is the honorary secretary. Dr. Maclean and Dr. McNaught are joint honorary secretaries of the British section.

Anyone, amateur or professional, can become a member of the Society without nomination or election on payment of £1 per annum to the treasurers, Messrs. Breitkopf & Härtel, 54, Great Marlborough Street, London, W. The subscription to the Society does not entitle members to attend the Congress without further payment, but in the present instance it has been decided to invite all foreign members free, and to allow each member of the British section two serial tickets at the reduced rate of 12s. 6d. each. These tickets admit to all lectures, concerts and gatherings announced below, except where it is stated that admission will be by invitation.

GUARANTORS.

As the expenses of the Congress are certain to be large, a guarantee fund has been formed. This has reached about £10,000. At the outside not more than one-fourth of the guarantees will be called up, the committee having decided not to incur indebtedness beyond this percentage of the total fund. No special privileges have so far been offered to guarantors.

LIST OF MEETINGS, CONCERTS, ETC.

The following is a list of the week's engagements: Mornings, from Wednesday, May 31, to Friday, June 2, from ten to one o'clock, will be devoted to meetings of sections for reading papers, at the University of London, Imperial Institute Road, South Kensington.

MONDAY EVENING, MAY 29.

RECEPTION by Messrs. Novello at the offices of the Congress, 160, Wardour Street, Soho, at 9 o'clock. (Invitation only.)

TUESDAY, MAY 30.

OPENING CEREMONY at 12 o'clock, at the University of London, Imperial Institute Road, South Kensington.

AFTERNOON, AT 3.

should be addressed to Augustus Littleton (Chairman of the Reception and Entertainments Committee), 160, Wardour Street, Soho, London, W., or to L. G. Sharpe, 61, Regent Street, W.The Metropolitan daily journals have given much space to announcements regarding the Congress.
The Times, the Daily Telegraph, and the Morning Post have printed the programmes in full in their music news columns. In The Times of April 10, a letter appeared from 'A Slave of St. Cecilia' commenting favourably upon the programme. He said:TO THE EDITOR OF The Times.SIR,—Your musical column this morning shows that British musicians are determined to proclaim their belief in their national art during the forthcoming International Musical Congress; and the scheme which you describe appears to be a most comprehensive one. As, however, some details still remain to be determined, it may not be too late to offer one suggestion to the Committee of the Congress. Your article contains the announcement that 'Madrigals will be sung at the historical concert of the opening day, and by the Huddersfield Choral Society two days later. Purcell and the later composers will be duly honoured.'Mine is a suggestion for the honour of Purcell, but still more for the honour of British music as represented at the Congress. There is a chorus in Purcell's 'Ode on St.
Cecilia's Day,' beginning 'Soul of the World,' which would make the most inspiring motto that any musical festival could possibly have. It is described to-day in your notice of the performance by the Oriana Madrigal Society as 'the masterpiece of the whole work'; it is that and more, for it is among the greatest utterances in the whole of choral art. If the Huddersfield Choral Society would place it at the head of their programme, they would give us in the five minutes which it takes to perform a complete epitome of all that is noblest in English music. Further, if Messrs.
Novello & Co., who publish the Ode, would issue the chorus separately and sell it for twopence, it might become a national possession in the real sense in which Handel's
'Hallelujah' is a national possession, sung and loved wherever choral music is practised.On April 12, the following letter from Dr. McNaught appeared:TO THE EDITOR OF The Times.SIR,—The suggestion of your correspondent, 'A Slave of St. Cecilia,' which appeared in your issue yesterday, that the chorus 'Soul of the World,' from Purcell's 'Ode on St.
Cecilia's Day,' should be included in the programme to be given by the Huddersfield Choir at the Queen's Hall on the afternoon of June 1, has been at once adopted. The chorus will be rehearsed by the choir to-night.

On behalf of the committee I beg to thank the writer.

THE PIANOFORTE RECITAL.

BY FREDERICK KITCHENER.

Little did Franz Liszt foresee, when he first gave pianoforte performances termed 'Recitals,' what an important innovation he was bringing into the world. If he were alive to-day, would he not gasp in astonishment at the number of such recitals given in London every week—nay, every day—during the musical season? Broad-minded genius that he was, hating staleness and convention, he would at once note that the pianoforte recital of to-day had got into a rut; that the programmes of nine pianoforte recitals out of ten contain a number of pieces which are given ad nauseam, year in and year out, while at the same time there exist quantities of splendid pianoforte music unperformed. Surely he would give his opinion of the matter in no undecided terms.

Every one knows exactly what to expect at the typical modern pianoforte recital. A Beethoven Sonata; a Chopin selection; one of the larger Schumann works; one or two Brahms's Intermezzi, or maybe the Handel or Paganini Variations; perhaps one of Liszt's arrangements of Bach's organ fugues; certainly, and as a sine qua non, a Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody, as blatant Doxology. Of course, such works as these (saving the Liszt Rhapsody) are the very cream of pianoforte music; but surely other works might be given. Why, as an example, should Liszt be generally represented by Hungarian Rhapsodies, when he wrote so many other pieces of infinitely superior artistic value?

Think of the mass of pianoforte music bestowed upon an ungrateful world by Anton Rubinstein: the Caprices, really valuable and artistic; the six Preludes and Fugues, Op. 53; the 'Kamenoi-Ostrow,' a gallery of delightful portraits; some Sonatas, and numbers of Nocturnes, Impromptus, Melodies (yes; there are better Melodies of Rubinstein than the evergreen in F); and cabinet pieces. If the name of Rubinstein ever occurs at all upon a recital programme, it is generally in connection with the 'Valse-Caprice,' a youthful freak disowned by the composer in maturer years. It is surely one of Fate's ironies that such a gifted, genial, and earnest composer should be known to most people by a couple of small and inferior pieces, of which he himself, and rightly, thought nothing!

Theodor Kirchner was a composer whose works obtained, and deserved, the eulogies of Robert Schumann. His complete pianoforte works fill several volumes. The 'Albumblätter' (Op. 7) were often played in public by Madame Schumann, and are worthy of a place in any programme. Many living pianists, no doubt, would consider themselves much greater than Kirchner, and would play his compositions with a certain air of patronage. Then there is Raff, whose works are noticeable for their beauty of tone-colour. Already Raff is voted 'old-fashioned'; it is difficult to understand why.

That the pianoforte compositions of Sterndale Bennett should be now practically shelved is indeed sad. The 'Six Studies in the form of Capriccios' make a fine work, from every point of view, for a pianoforte recital; but these too are 'old-fashioned.' So much the worse, then, for the fashions, if this is so! Great brilliancy, refinement, and polish are perhaps not the qualities most appreciated by present-day devotees of music. Some people, ever craving for the new, be it never so hideous or outrageous, seem to lose all sense of proper musical perspective.

There are also many living and well-known composers whose pianoforte works have a greater claim upon our attention than we allow them. Such a work as the fine Pianoforte sonata of Vincent D'Indy should be played in public often and often; and we may say the same of the clever and original Variations of Paul Dukas. Rachmaninoff is known chiefly by his celebrated Prelude in C sharp minor; but he has written many other pieces quite equal in value to this. The name of Christian Sinding upon the cover of a book of pianoforte pieces guarantees their originality, power, and character; but for all we hear one might really think that Sinding had never composed anything else than 'Frühlingsrauchen.' Any of his books of pieces contain examples of his art which cry out for greater recognition.

In England, have we not in Algernon Ashton a composer whose many pianoforte pieces would, were he a native of any other country, be performed in public at least twenty times as often as they are now? Mr. Benjamin J. Dale has also given to the world a Sonata which ought to be in every pianist's repertory. Joseph Holbrooke and Cyril Scott are well-known names; their pianoforte compositions deserve to be played publicly again and again, not only by English, but also by foreign pianists.

It is not too much to say that a great many pianoforte recitals are, in reality, ordeals of the most trying nature to those who attend them; but these brave people (especially among English audiences) set their teeth and make up their minds to 'sit the thing through,' though inwardly longing for the end. They then will be able to say that they have really heard the great So-and-so; for not to have heard him would be a mark of intellectual inferiority.

Even the true musician must sometimes confess to a feeling of boredom, be the player never so great and the compositions of the finest, in having to 'sit for a long time and listen to the tones of a single instrument. He suffers the pianoforte recital in silence, yearning in his heart for a violin solo or a song to break the monotony.

It is apparent, however, that the tendency to sameness in these one-person performances is beginning to be acknowledged; and artists of the calibre and artistic standing of Signor Busoni and M. Ysaÿe have given many joint recitals. Why should not the idea be carried farther, and recitals be given by three artists? We can, unfortunately, only conceive of the delights of a Melba-Paderewski-Kreisler or a Carreño-Carusó-Gerard recital; it is to be hoped that the day will come when the public, satiated by the one-person performance, will demand such joint art-feasts.

Meanwhile the number of one-person pianoforte recitals increases at such a rate as to give cause for anxiety, if not alarm, but luckily the number of pianists who feel that the success of their ventures justifies them in giving further recitals is very small. How welcome would be a new instrument; at once as expressive as the violin, as majestic and powerful as the organ, and as brilliant and supple as the pianoforte! We fear, however, that we may have to wait some time before such an instrument is perfected. But who knows? This is an age of marvels; and if miracles of mechanism are daily being worked before our eyes, why not miracles in the way of musical instrument invention?

* WELSH NATIONAL MUSIC.

BY FRANK KIDSON.

In my endeavour to arrive at the truth regarding the national music of Wales, I welcome any criticism that will help in clearing away the untruth and lumber that have always surrounded the subject. 'The bells of Aberdovey' exists only in two versions—Dibdin's, 1785, and Miss Williams's, 1844. The argument that because Dibdin employed a parody of 'Ar hyd y nos' (first printed in 1784) in his opera 'Liberty Hall,' 1785, is not conclusive evidence that he did the like in regard to 'Aberdovey.' 'Ar hyd y nos' was continually reprinted, while 'Aberdovey,' except in Dibdin's publications, did not reappear for fifty-nine years.

Neither of the two melodies bears any marks of antiquity in melodic structure, and they might easily have been composed within a few years of their publication. Dibdin's opera saw the light early in February, 1785, but the music had been in existence some time before this. Jones's 'Welsh Bards' is dated 1784, and the chances are that Dibdin's version of 'Ar hyd y nos' was already on paper before this year. From what source did each get his copy?

Reverting to 'Aberdovey,' it is significant that Miss Williams declines to commit herself, and does not make a Welsh claim. She merely says, 'The origin of this air is unknown.' It must be remembered that Dibdin's version had been freely circulated on sheet music for nearly sixty years. How tunes change in traditional passage every collector of folk-music knows. The reason why Dibdin's 'Aberdovey' does not appear in general English collections is obvious. The song has no interest apart from the opera. An editor naturally takes the best and most interesting examples of a composer's songs. 'Jack Ratlin,' and the 'Race-horse,' both from 'Liberty Hall,' have interest, and are among the best of Dibdin's lyrics, and therefore in selecting from the opera these naturally take first place. Meanwhile 'Aberdovey' was always included in Dibdin's collected works.

The whole tone of my articles on the subject has been one of regret that editors of Welsh collections have, in the earlier period, been criminally careless, or totally unqualified to make a reliable selection of purely Welsh music. I blame later editors for blindly following in these misleading footsteps. Either they wilfully closed their eyes to facts, or, through lack of knowledge or opportunity, they failed to arrive at the truth. While I have the highest admiration for Miss Williams's attempt, and for her energy in breaking fresh ground, by going to the people for her material, yet, apart from 'Aberdovey' even she has erred in the acceptance of at least one tune that is neither Welsh nor folk-music. I refer to 'Fanny blooming fair,' to which she appends the following note: 'The melody, now first printed, is well-known in the Vale of Neath; the original words are by the bard David Nicholas.' Here we have an instance of a well-known 18th century melody, by Dr. Boyce, floating traditionally in South Wales, and noted down in all good faith as a Welsh folk-song and 'an ancient national air.'

The original song, 'Fanny blooming fair,' was written by Lord Chesterfield on Lady Frances Shirley, and set to music by William Boyce, then a young man. It was printed as a single-sheet song, and reprinted in Walsh's 'British Musical Miscellany' [1734], Bickham's 'Entertainer,' 1737, 'Calliope' [1738], and elsewhere. I again upon future Welsh editors to be more careful in the examination of sources.

While upon this subject, I would ask Why has 'Pasteen Fuen,' an undoubted Irish air, been accepted as Welsh under the title 'The delight of Meirionydd,' and upon what grounds is 'Of noble race was Shenken' still called a Welsh tune? As for the 'characteristics' of Welsh music, can any one attempt to define them until the music has had all foreign matter sifted from it?

Mr. Henry Riding gave a lecture on 'Living British Composers,' at the Buckhurst Hill Athenæum, on March 20. A lengthy programme of illustrations was presented by a contingent of the Loughton Choral Society.

M. ALEXANDRE GUILMANT.

By W. G. ALCOCK.

There have occurred too many cases of gifted men whose success has only commenced with their decease, and it is to the credit of English organists that the subject of this short and inadequate sketch, whose recent death has occasioned world-wide regret, should have been enabled to enjoy in his lifetime their appreciation of his work.

M. Alexandre Guilmant was born in 1837, at Boulogne-sur-Mer, where his father, who was an organist in the town, gave him his early musical training. But his real enthusiasm was kindled by Lemmens, whose performances made him resolve upon a course of training at the Brussels Conservatoire, where he could study under his guidance.

When twenty years of age, Guilmant became organist of St. Nicholas Church, Boulogne, and four years later, in 1871, he was appointed organist of La Trinité, Paris, a post he held for thirty years. His performances on the fine Cavallé-Coll organ there attracted many from far and near, and his powers as an accompanist, soloist, or as an exponent of the difficult and too rarely cultivated art of extemporising, gave him a unique position amongst the organists of his time.

His organ compositions have probably been more widely used at important recitals in this country than those of any other composer, probably from their power of attracting a wide circle of listeners, to which may be added their intrinsic value as music; for Guilmant seldom spoke without having something to say, and his manner of expressing himself always carried conviction. His mastery of form, attention to detail in construction, effective passage-invention and choice of stops, secured a result which at once satisfied the cultured musician and the occasional listener. Among his most successful pieces may be mentioned his seven Sonatas, that in D minor (No. 1) being originally written as a concerto, the Marche Funèbre et Chant Séraphique, Grand Chœur in D, and that in E flat, and many others of similar calibre, while smaller pieces, like the Meditation in A and the Caprice in B flat, will for a long time to come find a welcome in the programmes of organ recitals.

He also wrote for the Church, and his sacred music is very largely performed in France, while his Mass in F is often to be heard in this country. He was a reverent admirer of old schools of composition, including the English, and realised the genius of S. S. Wesley and others after him. His cantata 'Ariamne' was produced in France with much success.

M. Guilmant often visited this country, and I have a vivid recollection of his fine performance at the Union Chapel, Islington, in the early eighties, when he extemporised very splendidly upon a theme (Adeste Fideles) given him by a member of the audience. I also heard him at Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, some time later, and particularly recall his clean and artistic performance. The programme included his own arrangement of Chauvet's Andantino in D flat, slight enough in itself, but showing Guilmant's power even in small things. His first Sonata was, I think, included, and I was glad to find the Pastorale taken by the composer up to time, and not, as is often the case, languidly. Frequenters of the Bow and Bromley Institute will also recall the enthusiasm his playing evoked. He was often in Manchester, where his performances at the Town Hall gained universal approval and appreciation. The honorary degree of Doctor in Music was conferred upon him by Victoria University. His private visits in England included at least one to Ketton Hall, Rutland (then the seat of Mr. Hopwood), where the fine organ by Cavallé-Coll still stands, upon which M. Guilmant gave performances. He also acted (1890-4) as outside examiner at the Royal College of Music, work for which his wide experience and high abilities peculiarly fitted him. In his own land he had a host of admirers, including not only, of course, musicians of all sorts, but men of science, politics, art, and literature, and church dignitaries. His house became a centre of the arts, and he was always a delightful and hospitable host. Public recognition, too, was not wanting, as is testified by his having been a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour. He was also an Officer of the Academy, a Commander of St. Gregory, and a Knight of the Order of St. Sylvestre.

It is with pleasure, too, that we have lately welcomed in this country his favourite pupil, M. Joseph Bonnet (organist of St. Eustache), upon whom his cloak has apparently fallen. We at least recognise that in his hands the traditions laid down by his master will be reverently cherished.

England regrets the loss of a distinguished musician, and will always recognise the great services he devoted to the art his country and ours so highly prize.

A vivacious and in every way excellent performance of Goring Thomas's delightful comic opera 'The golden web' was given at the Court Theatre on April 5 by the pupils and professors of the London Academy of Music. Among a highly efficient cast, special mention is deserved by Madame Blanche Newcombe, who took up the part of Pamela at short notice; Mr. Arthur Durand, who gave a clever sketch of Manacé; Mr. C. Lionel Shingler, and Mr. R. E. Serveman. Mr. Henry Beauchamp conducted, and the stage management was in the capable hands of Mr. Charles Fry.

MAJOR STRETTON.

The promotion to the rank of Major of Captain Arthur J. Stretton, M.V.O., the Director of the Royal Military School of Music, Kneller Hall, is an event of unique interest in military music. It is the first occasion on which an Army musician has attained this rank, and shows the interest taken by the War Office in their musical department. Several military bandmasters hold the rank of Second Lieutenant. Major Stretton was the first musician to attain the rank of Captain, and has held his appointment at Kneller Hall since 1896. His work there has been excellent and, as it will be remembered, was the subject of congratulations by Sir Edward Elgar, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, and other distinguished musicians, on the occasion of their visit to Kneller Hall with the Worshipful Company of Musicians in 1910. We give his portrait in Captain's uniform.

THE PIANO-PLAYER.

BY BERTRAM SMITH.

It is perhaps hardly necessary to state whether a Pianola, Angelus, or what make of piano-player it was that first took up its position in my drawing-room six months ago. I admit that at the outset I doubted its utility. I remembered what Dr. Johnson said of women who spoke in public, that they were to be compared to a dog that stood on its hind legs; they didn't do it well, but it was very clever of them to do it all. Admittedly it was very clever of my player to play the pianoforte at all. But it was of no use to me unless it did it well. And in my unaccustomed hands it did it very badly. I levelled at it for two whole days much bitter scorn and sarcasm. I addressed it as a talking ape. I accused it of laying on the expression in coarse slabs. I very nearly expelled it from the house. But gradually we began to find ourselves on better terms. And as I learned the nature of it, and felt my way, so to speak, into its closer confidence, I found to my great delight that it was capable of a fine gradation, that it was even plastic, sensitive, responsive to a very high degree. Then at last it came home to me that I had found an ally of wide and splendid capabilities.

Let it be understood that I am not, in any strict sense, a musical person. By that I mean that I have never performed, with any shade of success, on any instrument; that I have never been able to recognize a 'diminished seventh' when I met one; that I have always been in grave doubt as to the meaning of such phrases as 'a return to the dominant,' and that I have to count laboriously from the bottom up when I would trace the name of any note among its bars and spaces. At the same time I have always been a keen and, I hope, intelligent listener. I am mightily at home with all the Beethoven Symphonies, and I think it would be hard to catch me out on any Wagner Leit-motif. But I have always rebelled against the sheer inaccessibility of the great mass of the music of the masters. After ten years of steady and consistent concert-going, I knew that I had reached no further than the mere fringe of the subject. And now, in a moment, we have changed all that.

I have a strong desire to defend, to acclaim, to glorify my piano-player. I know very well the case that is made out against it. I have one candid friend who will not listen to it, who blankly refuses to 'have his music made by machinery.' But other things of beauty, as I tell him, are made by machinery—such as aeroplanes, and silken fabrics, and chronometers. Why not music also? And granted that the 'attachment' is a machine, is not the pianoforte itself a machine, a highly complex machine, created to give us notes to strike? May we not go a step further and strike them? If we set a thief to catch a thief, may we not set one machine to play another? But it is contended that the result is mechanical and soulless, that it is not music. Let me at once admit the superiority of the nimblest human fingers, guided by the finest human intelligence, to any form of contrivance. Let me admit that there is some music, much music, that the player will not render as one would care to hear it. There still remains almost everything to be said for it. The greatest of pianists cannot, let me point out, play with four hands, as my player so often does. The great pianists furthermore are not here: nor any pianist. I do not want to have to put on my dress-clothes and go and sit in a draught whenever I listen to music. I want to remain at home and take it at my leisure. And finally and above all there is the great fact of répertoire. With a few unplayable exceptions, all music is within my reach at last. It is mine, mine to explore and study and enjoy. And that is the marvel of the thing.

For if one really comes to examine it the world's music has always been remote, locked up from the generality of mankind. I have been more assiduous that most in my pursuit of it. I have attended literally hundreds of concerts. I have armed myself with miniature scores, and richly annotated them in red ink. I have relentlessly tracked down the great orchestral works one by one, till I have heard nearly all of them. But what after all has been the extent of my conquest? I have said that I am familiar with the nine Beethoven Symphonies. But what of the Sonatas? I have heard perhaps—it is quite an outside estimate—a dozen of them. And there are thirty-eight. And as with Beethoven, so with every other composer. With the best will in the world, and without missing any reasonable opportunity, we may well go to our graves without having explored one quarter of our heritage. And now these silent scores—thousands of them!—are to speak to me. I am to be shut out no longer. And there is no visible end to this great wealth of new experience. Within an ordinary lifetime the supply will not run short. I am as one who has long laid futile siege to the strong-room where the treasure lies, listening at the keyhole, peering in through the window, baffled by the blank and steadfast walls. And now at last I hold the key.

And there is much more in it than that. Great music is remote from us in yet another sense. It is not enough to hear a symphony or concerto in a concert, and pass on. Thus to make casual acquaintance with a complex score is little better than studying a great picture by lightning flashes. I make bold to say that the enormous majority of an audience in this country—except perhaps that of the Promenades—are only able to gather and assimilate a small part of the music that they hear. It must be so. Something of its beauty indeed comes home to them, but much rolls far over their heads; and they may hear that symphony again next year, or the year after—when they should hear it three times in a week to grasp its meaning. What, for instance, can the amateur who has had no special study hope to make of a Liszt Pianoforte concerto at a first hearing, and when may he hope to hear it a second time?

I think—at least it is my own experience—that he will find himself for a great part of the performance in an arid desert, through which he must travel, catching here and there at some thing of beauty or some revelation of power that is swept by almost before he can grasp it. A few themes will stand out, and remain with him, but at the end the message that has come to him is vague, confused, obscure. Surely that great art-work had something more than that to tell him? Surely it were worth while, if it were possible, to approach it nearer, to wring from it, in a clear coherent tale, its wealth of beauty, to let it speak with a lucid and intimate voice?

The interpretation of the piano-player may be as faulty as you will. I am not contending that there is anything to be compared with the grand and complex voice of the full orchestra. But at least one can take such a score as this, and dwell on it for a time, and force it to render up its many secrets. And then, when one has looked deep into the heart of it, it may be greeted in the concert-room as a friend that has indeed a tale to tell. Believe me, the orchestra will discourse sublimely to you then. Soon you will be indebted to your player for countless golden hours.

Church and Organ Music.

MODERN ORGAN MUSIC.

An article on 'Modern Organ Music' appears in The Times of April 15, which should be read by everyone to whom the organ and its répertoire appeal. The writer deserves the thanks of all for the wholly admirable manner in which he has presented his subject, and organists may well be proud that their instrument receives due recognition. As we also have before pointed out, in the gradual attainment of a permanent form of organ the possibility of compositions for it appeals more generally to musicians at large. The influences of ecclesiastical surroundings, and the unwieldiness which was certainly a feature of the older instruments, no doubt resulted in a somewhat severe and stereotyped form of composition which repelled many and attracted few. The constant supply of fugues and works of similar character did little to bring the organ within the scope of that intimate musical appeal which is such a feature of the violin, pianoforte, or of vocal composition. But, as the writer of The Times article rightly says, when we consider the question of what 'modernity' really is, we must admit that it is rather a matter of spirit than of actual date. He quotes the Fantasia preceding the great G minor Fugue of J. S. Bach in support of this, and claims that if its appeal is limited by its severity, and its details of episodes and contrapuntal passages fix a date, its harmonic structure will carry the work far beyond others which may mark an epoch, and in fact always remain 'modern.'

The organ music of Germany, France and England is considered in its various aspects, and we have sorrowfully to admit that until the past few years we have little cause for satisfaction with our own contribution. We may well envy Germany in having produced a John Sebastian Bach, whose glorious works, as those of Shakespeare in literature, will live for all time. His sons, too, wrote much which is far too seldom heard. But there is another name which will live, though the man gave but one work. The name is Julius Reubke, and the work his tremendous Sonata on the 94th Psalm. It is 'difficult to speak without immoderation' in connection with this Sonata, and it certainly laid down a style for the organ as an entirely separate instrument, as did Chopin's music for the pianoforte.

Merkel's Organ Sonatas must be considered as a factor in the progress of German organ music, though to us he seems so anxious to get to his last movement, which is almost invariably a fugue.

We cannot help disagreeing with the position assigned to Rheinberger by our contemporary. His Finale to Sonata 5, and that to Sonata 12, with the whole of Sonata 13, are taken as signs of what 'might have been,' and he is accused of relapsing in his later works into more or less complacent austerity. We only say that we should add to the list certainly the Sonata in E flat minor and No. 20 in F, with others. But this is of course only a matter of opinion. The choral prelude, so consummately matured by J. S. Bach, is employed by Max Reger and Karg-Elert as a medium for their complex ideas, but our contemporary, though welcoming both as men with a message, is getting tired of waiting for that message.

In the matter of French organ music, César Franck is taken as a starting point, and though a Belgian he may be considered, of course, as of the French School. His work is considered unequal, though without it we might never have had the brilliance of Widor, whose sixth Symphony we are glad to see specially mentioned.

Guilman, whose recent death is universally regretted, undoubtedly rose sometimes above mediocrity, and produced works of artistic value, while M. Saint-Saëns has given examples which make us wish for more.

In English organ music, we are told that 'it is quite conceivable that we have found a road which is going furthest in the end.' We sincerely hope that may be so. But assuredly this consummation will hardly be more quickly gained by the stream of entirely unworthy trifles constantly poured out by some of our publishing houses. We have indeed any number of fine players, and if they will only have the courage to play music which is true and sincere as 'organ music,' their influence upon composers will be of undoubted value. We may point with pride to such works as the Sonata in C sharp minor, the 'Pœan' and the Concerto of Dr. Basil Harwood as examples of what is high and noble, and hope that such a worthy ideal may yet succeed in placing our country at least on an equality with others.

Mr. H. G. Ley, organist of Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford, writes to us as follows:

'It might be of interest to you to know that the cathedral organ here has been overhauled, and various improvements and additions made:

1. The Choir organ has been moved from the West to the East and placed in a swell-box. I was glad to find a remark in a back number of the Musical Times that this should be done if ever the organ was altered, as it was quite useless in its old position.
2. 32-ft. wood Contra violone (complete scale) has been added, and placed on the West wall of the Cathedral.
3. Swell to Choir coupler has been added.
4. Viol d'orchestre (Choir organ) added.
5. Cor Anglais and Corni di Bassetto re-voiced and placed in a swell-box. Great Principal re-voiced.
6. New Great to Pedal—composition pedal.
7. New action to Swell, Choir, and Solo Pedals, Willis's patent.
8. New Tremulant, with a special pedal to quicken or make the beats slower (new Willis's patent).
9. The whole organ thoroughly cleaned and overhauled. The entire work done by Willis.

'I might add that I have received some interesting documents from Mr. John Hele, of Plymouth, which seem to prove that there was a Father Smith organ here, as they are written in Smith's hand-writing. They chiefly deal with directions for the tuners. I have always understood that the only remnant that exists at present of this organ is the exceptionally fine case, and I believe 1685 to be its date. A Swanton "Kinetic" blower was also installed here about two years ago.'

The new organ in the Hull City Hall was opened by Mr. E. H. Lemare on Thursday evening, March 30, when the accomplished organist gave a memorable performance, which exhibited the remarkable resources of the instrument and his own astonishing command of its intricacies. His programme included examples of pure organ music, such as J. S. Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D major, and Mendelssohn's sixth Sonata, while the organ transcription, which is Mr. Lemare's peculiar property, was represented by Wagner's 'Waldweben' ('Siegfried') and by the Overture to 'William Tell.' Further variety was supplied by three pieces of Mr. Lemare's, and by Mr. Horsman's 'Curfew.' There was a crowded attendance, many hundreds, in fact, being turned away. Great enthusiasm prevailed, and the audience departed thoroughly satisfied that they had heard their new instrument to the best advantage.

SPECIAL SERVICES.

On the Tuesday before Easter, at St. Paul's Cathedral, Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion was given with all the impressiveness the noble work demands, and to which we have for so many years been accustomed under the exceptional conditions offered by the Cathedral and its superb musical staff. The choir was augmented by the 'Children' of the Chapel Royal, the Temple choristers, and others, while the Bach orchestra was represented by some of our best performers. Sir George Martin conducted, and Mr. Charles Macpherson was at the organ.

The high artistic standard attained at Chichester Cathedral under the care of Mr. F. J. Crowe, was maintained in a performance of Verdi's 'Requiem,' given on March 30 by the Cathedral Oratorio Society. The solos were sung by choristers of the Cathedral, Master Leslie Dunn (London College for Choristers), Mr. Robert Marley, Mr. Reginald Stewart, and Mr. W. H. Whiteside. An orchestra and Mr. Stephenson at the organ supplied accompaniments, and Mr. Crowe conducted.

On Sunday, April 2, at Brixton Church, Verdi's 'Requiem' was performed by the Brixton Oratorio Choir. The soloists were Miss Ada Tunks, Miss Alice Stroud, and Messrs. Frank J. Webster and Herbert Tracey. The principal first violin was Mr. R. Gray, and Mr. Welton Hickin was the organist. Mr. Douglas Redman conducted with distinction, and obtained an excellent performance.

On Palm Sunday afternoon, April 9, Bach's 'St. John' Passion was sung by the choir of St. Mary, Brookfield, Dartmouth Park Hill, N.W. Mr. James Horncastle sang the Evangelist's part, the remaining solos being taken by members of the choir. There was an efficient orchestra, and Mr. A. Gosling presided at the organ. Mr. Frank Eames, the organist of St. Mary's, conducted what was in all respects a highly creditable performance. Gounod's 'Messe Solennelle' was also sung at St. Mary's on Easter Sunday morning, with orchestral accompaniment, Mr. F. J. Wood presiding at the organ.

The first performance of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion in Aberdeen took place on April 13 at St. Ninian's Parish Church, by a special choir organized and conducted by Mr. Warren T. Clemens. The occasion was one of great impressiveness, and its artistic completeness both as a service and as a performance was exemplary. The solos were taken by Master J. Reid, Miss Jessie Gray, Mr. Henry Brearley, and Mr. W. Hayle. Mr. F. Boothroyd was at the organ.

On Palm Sunday afternoon, Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' was sung at St. Stephen's Church, St. Alban's, by an augmented choir. The soloists were Miss Florence Holderness, Miss Maud Wright, Mr. Charles Jones and Mr. Fred Aireton. Mr. George F. Wood, organist and choir-master of the church, accompanied at the organ. This was the first performance of the work at St. Alban's.

Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' was performed by the Bromley Choral Society, at Bromley Parish Church, on April 5. The soloists were Miss Lilian Evison, Miss Ada Tarry, Mr. George Macklin, and Mr. George Uttley. Mr. P. D. Hodson was the organist, and Mr. Frederic Fertel conducted.

A performance of Brahms's 'Requiem' was given in St. Peter's Church, Maida Vale, by the Essendine Choir, under the baton of Mr. W. Kendall. The soloists were Miss Winifred Marwood and Mr. Arthur Barlow. Mr. Norman Collie, organist of St. Peter's Church, supplied the instrumental accompaniments on the organ.

The Parish Church, Brighton, was well filled on Wednesday evening in Holy Week, when Harold Moore's sacred cantata 'The Darkest Hour' was sung by the choir, under the direction of the organist and choir-master. Mr. Chastey Hector, who presided at the fine Willis organ recently erected to the memory of the late King Edward VII. The part of the Saviour was sung by Mr. Fred. Hilton.

The usual Good Friday performance of 'The Messiah' was given at the Congregational Church, High Road, Ilford, the soloists being Miss Euneta Truscott, Miss Mary Williams, Mr. Gwilym Richards, and Mr. Stewart Gardner. Mr. Leonard C. F. Robson was at the organ, and Mr. Walter J. Walls conducted.

'The Messiah' (Part 2) was sung to a crowded congregation in Chigwell Church, on Good Friday afternoon. The soloists were Lady Sybil Smith, Madame Grace Day-Winter, Mr. Herbert Clinch and Mr. George Uttley. Mr. E. Cuthbert Nunn accompanied, and Mr. Henry Riding conducted.

'In the Desert and in the Garden,' a new Lenten cantata by Dr. Ferris Tozer, was performed under the conductorship of the composer in Heavitree Church, Exeter, on April 7. The solos were sung by Masters Brown and Lias, Dr. Tozer and Mr. Walter Belgrove. Mr. Allan Allen presided at the organ.

The 'Messiah' was performed at Leamington Parish Church on March 23 by the Madrigal Society, under the direction of Mr. Roberts West. Mr. W. H. Bellamy was the organist, and Madame Laura Taylor, Miss Muriel Leigh-Bennett, Mr. E. R. Ludlow, and Mr. Roland Morris were the soloists.

On April 9, at St. Peter's Church, Pontardawe, Maunder's cantata, 'Olivet to Calvary' was performed by the choir, under the direction of Mr. Ivan Williams, organist and choir-master.

Dr. C. Lee Williams's cantata 'Bethany' was sung at a Special Service on April 12 by the choir of St. James's Church, Bath. Mr. H. C. T. Gill accompanied at the organ.

We have received reports of Lenten performances of Stainer's 'Crucifixion' at the following churches and chapels: Holy Trinity, Southwell (Mr. A. E. Leatherland, organist). Chigwell School Chapel (Mr. H. Riding, conductor).

St. Edward's Parish Church, Romford (Mr. A. C. Chappell, conductor).

Parish Church, Mincinghampton (Mr. S. M. Ravenhill, conductor; Mr. G. E. Kiddle, organist).

Parish Church of St. Margaret, Lee (Mr. F. Leeds, organist); also performed Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater.'

Church of St. John the Baptist, Great Marlborough Street (Mr. T. F. Gillman, conductor; Mr. Martin Matthews, organist).

Faversham Parish Church (Mr. W. J. Keech, organist).

Greenwich Road Congregational Church (Mr. Fred. W. Flatt, organist).

West United Free Church, Aberdeen (Mr. Arthur Collingwood, conductor).

Magdalen College School Chapel, Brackley (Mr. P. Pickford, organist).

St. Paul's Church, East Molesey (Mr. P. Macdonald, conductor; Mr. E. Singleton, organist).

St. Bede's Church, Liverpool (Mr. E. H. Smith, conductor; Mr. T. T. Ford, organist).

St. Peter's Church, Maida Vale (Mr. Norman Collie, organist).

The programme chosen by Mr. H. Matthias Turton, for his organ recital at the Town Hall, Leeds, on April 15, included the following: St. Ann's Fugue (J. S. Bach), 'La nuit (an impression)' (Karg-Elert), Pœan (Basil Harwood), Fantasia in F minor (Mozart).

A sacred concert of miscellaneous character was given on March 30 by the choir of Avenue Baptist Church, St. Margaret's, Twickenham, under the direction of Mr. Frank Peters, to whose training the efficiency shown by the choir did credit.

On behalf of that deserving object, 'The Organists' Benevolent League,' Dr. W. Lemare gave a highly-successful concert in the St. Andrew's Hall, Leytonstone, when the programme was sustained by Dr. Lemare's pupils.

An interesting selection of appropriate music was performed by the choir of St. Mary, Brookfield, in illustration of a lecture on the Ober-Ammergau Passion Play given by the Rev. M. Le Marinel on March 21.

On April 11, the choir of Denmark Place Baptist Church, Camberwell, gave their annual concert, with an interesting programme. Mr. W. Hedley Staniland, organist and choir-master of the church, was the conductor.

Sir Edward Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George' was given in Longton Parish Church on Wednesday, March 22, under the direction of Mr. J. Bryan.

Reviews.

Postlude in C major. By W. G. Alcock.

Fantasia and Fugue in C minor. By J. D. Davis.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

This vigorous and well-written piece by the organist of the Chapel Royal will commend itself to all interested in organ music of a healthy and elevated character. It is in triple time throughout, and is moulded in the classic binary form. In the recapitulation section, however, only a portion of the second subject appears, and this, quite effectively, in the key of the subdominant. The piece will be found equally useful and interesting both for voluntary and recital purposes. No well-trained organist need find it at all troublesome in the matter of technique.

The influence of the modern harmonic school has largely affected the character of this organ piece. It is a difficult school to imitate, and Mr. Davis is at his best when he trusts to his own powers, which are obviously considerable, and suggest interesting developments. The fugue subject is a good one. We should consider the movement to be of a fugal nature rather than a strict organ fugue. Nevertheless the work would be far from ineffective, and the freedom employed will no doubt appeal to many.

Sonatina in C, for pianoforte. By Ernest Austin. Op. 37.
Simple Sonatinas on National Airs. By Ernest Austin. Op. 38. Nos. 1 to 6.

[J. H. Larway.]

Here is at least one of the young British lions prepared to 'roar you as gently as any sucking dove,' if thereby he obtains a wider audience. Mr. Austin has recently voiced the grievance that examination bodies pass too lightly over the claims of British music, and this present issue of Sonatinas is a professed attempt to supply the material of a remedy. The original Sonatina, Op. 37, is mapped out for the convenience of young fingers, whose placing requires special attention. Some little indulgences of what may be termed Mr. Austin's harmonic impatience will probably be taken for wrong notes by unsophisticated youth; but as a rule we have nothing but praise for the conception and laying out of this little work. In the Sonatinas based on national airs, Mr. Austin has made plentiful use of his ingenuity. They are full of little surprises and quaint touches of humour, expressed in simple diction and often conveyed in terms of two-part writing. One can imagine some old folks delighted to find their little ones playing the melodies they love, but somewhat perturbed at Mr. Austin's 'developments,' where the tunes seem to go all wrong. This need not, however, diminish the welcome given by musicians to Mr. Austin's experiment. His best claim to our gratitude is based on his avoidance of sentimentality and sickly harmonies. Numbers one and two of the Sonatinas are based on English themes; number three is a set of variations on the Irish theme, 'The Rakes of Mallow'; number four is based on Welsh themes; and numbers five and six on Scotch themes.

PART-SONGS FOR MIXED VOICES.

Irene. A madrigal. Words by J. F. R. Stainer. Composed by C. E. Miller.

Lullaby. English words by W. G. Rothery. Music by Brahms.

Coronation Day. Words by Mary Bradford Whiting. Music by Percy E. Fletcher.

Our sailor King. Words by Clifton Bingham. Music by Charles H. Lloyd.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

The madrigal 'Irene,' by Mr. C. E. Miller, was awarded the Molineux Prize and the medal of the Madrigal Society in December, 1909. It is a bright work, which answers to the title 'madrigal' by its contrapuntal and imitative writing and restrained harmonic scheme, and by the constant little turns of expression which recall the madrigalian period. It is in five parts (S.S.A.T.B.).

The Brahms 'Lullaby' is a welcome adaptation for mixed voices (accompanied), done by John E. West, of the popular 'Wiegenlied.' It has already been issued in two-part and three-part arrangements.

Having cultivated the useful habit of writing broad, diatonic tunes of popular nature fit for use at festive patriotic meetings, Mr. Percy Fletcher naturally gives full indulgence to the habit for the present season. 'Coronation Day,' one of the fruits of his indulgence, is in three similar verses, with a short Coda. It starts in the key of C major, and hardly ever leaves it. The tune is unsophisticated and easily learned, and the part-writing and accompaniments are correspondingly light in their demands. Such a combination of virtues should win easy acceptance for the piece on coronation and other days.

Dr. Lloyd's 'Our sailor King' is another choral song of the broad and popular type, differentiated from the preceding by its more fully worked-out part-writing and harmonies. It is equally to be recommended as a medium for patriotic manifestations.

A Flower Service (No. 2). A complete order of service for children.

[Skeffington & Son.]

The Service includes prayers, versicles, lessons and hymns, and will be most useful for the pretty occasions which have suggested their compilation. We only regret one or two of the tunes. Why should children be condemned to sing so many hymns to tunes in  $\sharp$  time? We find no excuse for the inclusion of the Neapolitan air, which is entirely unsuitable for use in Church. The rhythm of the words admits of other treatment. We do not consider 'With verdure clad' a 'suitable' voluntary, as suggested in the footnote. Would not Brahms's 'A rose breaks into bloom' point the moral more worthily? But our business is to criticise, while our pleasure lies in the opposite direction, and we welcome the Service in spite of what we venture to call its shortcomings.

Te Deum Laudamus. In the key of A major. By Sir Frederick Bridge.

Give the King Thy judgments, O God. Anthem for festival or general use. By A. Herbert Brewer.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Composed for the Tercentenary of the authorised version of the Bible, 1911, Sir Frederick Bridge's setting fulfils the requirements of breadth and dignity with simple harmonic construction, and there will be no doubt very many occasions when its use will be acceptable. Having heard the Te Deum, we are in a position to say that Sir Frederick has been very successful in gaining great effect by simple and quite original means.

Dr. Brewer, in writing for the Gloucester Diocesan Choral Festival, has borne in mind the conditions under which his music would be heard, and his great experience has led him by interesting and yet straightforward lines, resulting in an anthem within the capabilities of the various local choirs taking part in the festival. The work might well serve for general use, and will no doubt find wide acceptance.

Mr. Chanter's anthem is worthy of note, if only for its organ part, which is well written, and independent of the choral portion. There are points of interest in the latter also, and the Choral forming the final section should be effective. The composer has a style of his own, and may be encouraged to further effort, if he bear in mind the importance of reserve in his harmonic scheme.

PART-SONGS FOR FEMALE VOICES.

Slumber-songs of the Madonna. Words by Alfred Noyes. Music by Colin Taylor.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Appropriately tender music has been wedded to the expressive verses in these songs, and thoroughly artistic results are achieved without recourse to a complicated phraseology which would destroy the proper ingenuousness. The songs are laid out for unaccompanied four-part female choir, and are three in number, their names being 'See, see what a wonderful smile,' 'In the warm blue summer weather,' and 'Sleep, baby sleep.' They present no considerable difficulty. The squareness often associated with simplicity is avoided by breaking up and varying the rhythm, and such chromatic harmonies as are used do not make the parts unvoiced. A portion of the third number is written for solo voice and choral accompaniment 'with closed lips.' The open vowel 'oo' with loose lips has a smoother, prettier and more blendful effect than the tightening of the lips which induces nasality.

THE STUDY OF RHYTHM.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—I am afraid it will be difficult to dispose of so clear-headed and practical a musician as Aristoxenus on the ground of any 'fallacy' in his theories. It is true that his common-sense teaching was for many centuries overshadowed by the vague mysticism and mathematical calculations of the Pythagoreans, who did so much to retard the development of the musical art. It is true that Cicero pronounces the works of Aristoxenus utterly unintelligible (Hawkins, History, vol. i., p. 181); and that Burney (History, vol. i., p. 455) sneers at Aristoxenus for his endeavour to provide a system of 'tempered' intervals, whereby modulation to every key might be available.

As to Cicero's opinion, every one now knows, thanks to recent research, that the Græco-Roman grammarians of his day made utter confusion between the metre of poetry and the rhythm of music, for they did not understand music; and this confusion has continued nearly to the present day. Richard Wagner, writing in 1851, suggested that the metrists should apply the rules of the rhythmical structure of modern music to the Greek Dramas: thus only, he said, could they be brought to a recognisable rhythm. The appearance during the next few decades of many works founded on the Aristoxenian theory, which had only recently been investigated, showed that Wagner was right: for this theory proved that the rhythmical forms of the Greek Drama were practically identical with those of modern music. I doubt if a fallacious theory could have restored to us the inspiring rhythms of a Sophocles or a Pindar.

As to the tempered scale, Aristoxenus merely forestalled modern practice by some twenty centuries. It is well known how the war of the temperaments went on from the time of Bartolo Ramis in 1482 till the 18th century, when J. S. Bach settled once for all that equal temperament was the only possible method of tuning by which music for keyed instruments could develop.

If Aristoxenus is fallacious in matters of rhythm, then the composer of to-day who divides his music by bars, the conductor who beats time in connection with these bars, and above all the sensitive performer who produces an intelligent 'phrasing,' must all found their efforts on fallacious ideals. For the bar is the modern presentment of the Aristoxenian foot or measure, the conductor's beat that of the arsis and thesis, and the phrasing of the cultivated musician agrees in principle with the Aristoxenian theories of cola, periods, monopodies, dipodies, &c., with their rising or falling accentuations, their cesuras, and so forth.—Yours faithfully,

C. F. ABDY WILLIAMS.

THE ORIGIN OF THE IRISH HARP.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—I have read with interest Mr. Grattan Flood's strictures on my theory of the origin of the 'Irish harp,' and will deal with them in the paper which I have been asked to read on the subject before the International Society of Musicians, when they meet in London at the end of May.—Yours faithfully,

BACH'S 'ST. MATTHEW' PASSION.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Last Monday evening I attended once more the service at St. Paul's Cathedral, at which an abridgment of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion is sung with augmented choir and orchestral accompaniments. As I looked at the vast congregation, my mind went back to a memorable Maundy Thursday evening, forty years ago, when, as a member of Mr. Joseph Barnby's choir, I took part in a service in Westminster Abbey at which, I believe for the first time in England, Bach's sublime work was rendered as he intended, namely, as a portion of a service, with an address between the parts.

There are probably not a great many members of the choir still left; but those who are, will, I think, bear me out in saying that we did not take very kindly to Bach's music. It was so different from that of Handel, Haydn and Mendelssohn, to which we had been accustomed, that it seemed beyond our grasp. I have still a vivid recollection of the 'Passion' in Exeter Hall (the smaller one), and remember how it became necessary to have the choir in detachments at Messrs. Novello's warehouse to go over and master the troublesome portions of the music.

It required all Mr. Barnby's generalship to bring the work to a successful issue; and I remember that in the course of one of those encouraging little speeches which he used to make during rehearsals—speeches which were so helpful—he said something to this effect: 'Ladies and gentlemen, you do not like this music yet; but you will get to like it, and we shall make the public like it.' In the forty years which have passed since these words—prophetic words, one might say—were uttered, how the public have come to like Bach's two settings of the 'Passion' is shown by the numerous announcements of their use in connection with the Lenten services of the Church. The attainment of this popularity is a striking example of what may be done by a combination of foresight, initiative, force of character, and business enterprise.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

R. FREEMAN.

HEREDITY AND VOICE.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—The Musical Times recently contained an interesting communication entitled 'The evolution of the adult male voice,' by E. Davidson Palmer.

The law of heredity is the same in the adult male and adult female voice. The characteristics of one parent will assert themselves in the voice of a child of the other sex at the age of fourteen, in addition to whatever has been conspicuously like either father or mother in childhood.

Daughters of musical mothers and non-musical fathers, with whom I am acquainted, who could not even carry a tune before they were fourteen, found at that age both fine voices and the ability to sing.

When both parents are singers, the father's voice is more prominent in the first, and the mother's in the second, child. Later children show sometimes voices more evenly balanced, as if the 'seven kinds of heredity' influenced them in turn.

When the Autocrat of the Breakfast Table was asked how early the education of children should begin, his answer was: 'A hundred years before they are born.' This is emphatically true of the singing voice.—Yours respectfully,

E. LL. DANIELS.

'COME LIVE WITH ME.'

Mrs. Godfrey Pearse, of Hitcham Land, Taplow, Bucks, wishes to obtain a copy of a song 'Come live with me and be my love,' on the outside of which is an illustration of her father and mother, Mario and Evilia Grisi—he with a mandoline, and she coming down the steps of a terrace to listen.

Obituary.

We regret to have to record the following deaths:

Lady HALLÉ, in Berlin, on April 15. With her death there passes away a violinist who was one of the greatest of her time and whose name, as Madame Norman-Neruda, was once a household word. The present generation will not feel the loss as keenly as those with whom the great days of the Popular Concerts are a living memory. In their minds a link with the past is broken. The esteem in which she was held by her greatest contemporary is exemplified in the remark made by Joachim when she first came under his notice: 'When people have heard her play, they will think less of me.'

Wilma Neruda was born on March 29, 1839, and inherited a name already famous in the musical world. In 1846 she made her first appearance as a violinist at a concert in Vienna, and from that time was constantly before the public, first as a prodigy of extraordinary talent and afterwards as a mature artist whose playing was of transcendent expressiveness. In 1864 she became the wife of Ludwig Norman, and assumed the name of Madame Norman-Neruda. Her appearance at a Philharmonic Concert on May 17, 1869, was the beginning of a long connection with London musical life. She became closely associated with the London Popular Concerts in particular, and with all the principal series of concerts then given. In 1888 she married Sir Charles Hallé, the pianist, with whom she constantly appeared, both in London and in Manchester. In 1901 the title of 'Violinist to the Queen' was conferred upon her by Queen Alexandra.

Madame NEWLING, principal of a School of Music in Bournemouth and director of the choir which bore her name, on April 15. For many years her position in musical circles of the town had been prominent, and the loss of her beneficent influence will be keenly felt.

'THE RING' IN THE PROVINCES.

The enterprise of Mr. Ernst Denhof, in introducing to the provinces Wagner's 'Ring of the Nibelung,' has an interest extending far beyond the three centres at which it has been given: Leeds, Manchester, and Glasgow. Its origin may be traced to Dr. Richter's experiment at Covent Garden, when he endeavoured to convince the public that performances of opera in the vernacular, sung by native artists, indicated the surest road to the attainment of the 'National Opera' for which so many musical people are striving. Our principal touring companies have long pointed in the same direction, but their praiseworthy efforts have hitherto been limited by commercial considerations, and the public has still to be convinced that opera in English may be made just as good an article as when it is given in Italian, German, or French. The success of the Covent Garden 'Ring' in English was so very generally allowed that people are still wondering why it led to nothing further, but in the meantime Mr. Denhof, an Edinburgh musician, took up the idea, and in the Spring of 1910, produced the 'Ring' in Edinburgh. The result was more successful from an artistic than from a pecuniary point of view, but, having broken the ice, Mr. Denhof was sufficiently encouraged to carry his enterprise further afield, and this year, after ascertaining the amount of support he was likely to receive in various large towns, he decided upon a three-weeks' tour, including Leeds, Manchester, and Glasgow, in the order named. For two whole weeks beforehand rehearsals were held at Leeds, under Mr. Michael Balling, who has been a tower of strength to the enterprise. For the first week he had the orchestra alone, consisting chiefly of members of the Scottish Orchestra, together with a few London players, while during the second week the principal singers were also present. This deserves mention, since the cost of preparation has been an important factor in arranging the prices of admission, which have of course been very much above what are usually in vogue in the provinces. If, as is hoped by all who were present at the performances, Mr. Denhof's scheme is to bear fruit in the future, it is desirable that some other populous towns—Liverpool, Birmingham, Bristol or Newcastle for instance—may be encouraged by the success of this effort to join in the scheme, for by so doing, the cost to each individual town may be materially reduced. The impression made by the 'Ring' at each of the three towns where it has just been performed is duly recorded below, but it may at once be said that Mr. Denhof has given such proof of his artistic thoroughness that any similar scheme he may incline to submit in the future will be received with interest and enthusiasm. Whether it will be wise to repeat the 'Ring' a year hence may be doubted; probably it may be found more discreet to choose three or four of Wagner's other works, and to give them on a similar scale of completeness, and thus by degrees to form something in the nature of a repertory of operas which are really beyond the powers of companies with small orchestras and limited resources. In one respect a touring company can rarely give absolute satisfaction, for the mise en scène of a work like the 'Ring,' and especially its complex effects of lighting, can only be achieved in a permanent abode, where opera is constantly being given; but any shortcomings of this kind only point to the necessity of a fully-equipped opera-house after the Continental fashion. Where each performance of a work is virtually, so far as the stage is concerned, a full-dress rehearsal, perfect finish is necessarily unattainable. The smoothness with which these 'Ring' performances were carried through was indeed remarkable, and under the conditions which obtained it would be absurd to expect an ideal representation, but this is the one matter in which, with a fuller experience, we may look forward to a still higher result.

LEDS.

The Leeds performance took place on March 28 to April 1, and attracted a large and attentive audience from all parts of the county. The success of the event was unqualified. In spite of prices quite beyond precedent in local theatrical annals, the large theatre was well filled at all the performances, and crowded for 'Die Walküre' and 'Götterdämmerung.' The behaviour of the audiences was remarkably good, and the interest was well sustained to the end, when it culminated in a scene of enthusiasm rarely equalled by us reticent Northerners. The centre of this enthusiasm was the conductor, Mr. Balling, to whose remarkable ability and intimate knowledge of the work the success of the performance is mainly due. He had a band of eighty-two, chiefly members of the Scottish Orchestra, and made it as perfect an instrument of accompaniment as one could wish. Indeed, the outstanding feature of the performance was the clearness with which the text could, in most cases, be followed. In the matter of enunciation, a special tribute is due to the singers, for the cast showed what capital material we have in this country: artists with fresh voices, a really vocal method, good articulation, and a keen dramatic intelligence. The Sieglinde, Miss Florence Easton, was from all points of view admirable. She not only looked, she was the character, and every word of her part was audible. Madame Gleeson-White, too, was a convincing Brünnhilde; she also looked the part, and if at times one could have desired more ample vocal resources, she sang with sympathetic charm. Very much the same criticism could apply to Mr. Frederic Austin's Wotan, which, if not commanding, was dignified and refined. Of especial interest was the Siegfried of Mr. John Coates, since it was the first time this clever and original artist had essayed the part. Even a slight over-anxiety did not hinder him from giving a fine interpretation, especially in the first and second Acts of 'Siegfried,' in which he acted with delightful spirit and energy, emphasizing the boyish attributes of the hero. Mr. Sydney Russell's Mime was an excellent reading, and his enunciation was perfect, while on an equally high plane was the careful and finished performance of Mr. Radford as Fasolt and Hunding. Mr. Walter Hyde made a brilliant Loge and a sympathetic Siegmund, and he, with Miss Easton and Mr. Radford, combined to give as fine an interpretation of the first Act of 'Die Walküre' as it has ever been my good fortune to witness. Mr. Knowles's Hagen and Mr. Victor's Alberich deserve favourable mention, and the other parts were well filled, the cast being indeed adequate all round. The male-voice choir, supplied by the Leeds Choral Union, sang well, and, considering their inexperience of the stage, comported themselves creditably. The scenic effects sufficed, but were not of course the strongest feature of the production, which as a whole spoke volumes for the artistic enterprise of the promoter, Mr. Denhof, and has made many Yorkshire people ask if so promising a venture is to be allowed to remain a solitary one.

MANCHESTER.

The coming of the 'Ring' dramas brought some new sensations into the daily round of Manchester's busy commercial life. Salesmen and buyers making tours of the big warehouses might see displayed on the walls, or in the windows of public-houses in mean little streets, theatre bills announcing the performance of 'Rheingold,' 'Valkyrie,' 'Siegfried,' 'Twilight of the Gods,' and one wonders what the little 'nippers,' attendant upon the big cloth-laden lorries, and many other people thought of these strange writings on the wall. Then you had busy merchants hurrying off 'Change to their warehouses and offices so to leave affairs that they might arrive at the Theatre Royal at 5.30 or 6 p.m., for the German community here stood by Denhof and Balling, and the German colony is essentially a business one. The attendant disturbance of the normal course of domestic and business life had many compensations. Manchester assimilated to some extent the Bayreuth habit; but we cannot rise to open-air restaurants yet, and the use of the fanfares between the acts would have struck the imagination of passers-by in the streets as could nothing else.

Hitherto Manchester has, broadly speaking, been content to neglect other conductors who have visited us from time to time: Wood, Beecham, Ronald, Nikisch, have never drawn the throng. This fidelity to Richter has its meritorious side, but it has meant that the average music-goer here thinks that there has been only one reading of great music, that of the veteran who has now left us. The 'Ring' dramas have made those folks rub their eyes, and they have discovered that there is at least one conductor other than Richter who can cope with Wagner's monumental works and not be crushed. This may be said without disparagement of the great pioneer.

The 'paying' part of the Manchester public hitherto has fought shy of such opera as we have been able to get from even the best of travelling companies, because of inadequate orchestras; this, true, of our opera-attitude in general, is still more so of the Wagner-attitude in particular. Wagner is immensely popular here, but the familiarity is not of the theatre so much as of the concert-room, and the Hallé performances with a hundred players under Richter have spoiled us for theatres where only half that number can be accommodated. Denhof and Balling have overcome to a considerable extent this apathy, despite exceptional difficulties in the theatre, which is relatively small for even an orchestra of eighty-two, and those whose purse drove them into the half-crown seats or standing-room in the 'gods,' at any rate got Wagner's music in better perspective than did the more opulent occupants of stalls or circle. Those of the audience who had seen and heard the 'Ring' dramas before, had either Covent Garden or Continental experience, and in stage-setting and details of management the comparison, of course, could not be flattering. The secrets of atmospheric effect and pageantry of clouds may be hidden from them, but the Theatre Royal folks had the good sense not to attempt the impossible with their quite inadequate machinery, and so they 'cut' the flight of the Valkyries (in which Paris easily excels even Bayreuth), and in such stage-settings as the Rhine-maidens swimming and the flame-girt mountain, did the best they could to produce the illusion, and with no steam-curtains to help, this could be no easy matter at times. Great singing there was in abundance, but not great acting; yet, remembering how long it took Germany to evolve singer-actors and actresses of the type of Schnorr von Carolsfeld, Niemann, Materna, Ternina, Gulbranson (although a Swede), Wittich, Hans Breuer, Van Rooy, it would indeed be childish to complain that English singers, who were not opera-trained from the start, failed in a brief three years to attain the same high standard; that they have got so far so quickly, shows the stuff they are made of. Balling is in the true Wagner succession; after the three mighty stalwarts, Liszt, Bulow, and Richter, came their disciples, and Balling is one of the chief; the modern executive musician can approach no greater task than these gigantic scores, and when much else may have faded from the memory, the conductor's handling of his forces will surely remain.

There was much good critical writing in the papers during the week. The sum of potential energy in all great art-works is without limit: fresh and apprehensive minds approach them, and they strike a new flash of light; for example, 'In the call of the Valkyries the sense of rhythmic recklessness of motion has received its final and definitive musical expression; it is the horrid fascination of the aviator's vol plané.' Again, 'A subsidized theatre seems less than ever likely. Is it possible to cheapen the production of Wagner without ruining the quality of the performances? It seems doubtful, so long as we regard them as operas in the strict sense. If we were content to regard them as vocal and orchestral symphonies with pictorial accompaniment, the problem might be easier. In default of a regular opera-house and any normal solution of difficulties, we may some day be driven to a combination of cinematograph with singers and orchestra.'—[Both from the Manchester Guardian.]

The committee of the Manchester Musical Society wisely arranged a series of explanatory lectures in the closing days of March, delivered by Dr. Keighley, which were largely attended by subscribers to the 'Ring' performances.

GLASGOW.

The performance of 'The Ring of the Nibelung' on April 11, 12, 13, 15, will be regarded by many as the outstanding feature of the Glasgow musical season. Herr Denhof, to whose enterprise we here owe our first acquaintance with the great tetralogy as a complete work, is to be congratulated on the artistic success of his venture. Possibly the Glasgow performances benefited in some degree by coming last in the scheme: in any case nothing so fine or so complete in the presentation of opera has ever been given in Glasgow, and this applies not only to the all-round excellence of the solo vocalists and to the stage setting, but chiefly to the magnificent orchestra so ably directed by Herr Michael Balling. The audiences, comprising some who were familiar with the entire work, some whose knowledge of the music was limited to concert performances of excerpts, and many drawn merely out of curiosity aroused by the 'Ring' newspaper articles forecasting the performances and by the talk of their musical friends, were entirely enthusiastic, and the reception given to the performances indicates that should Herr Denhof give another series he may depend upon a much more generous measure of public support. The week fixed for the Glasgow performances was just a little unfortunate, falling as it did at a time when there is a very general exodus of holiday-makers from the city, but notwithstanding this the audiences were sufficiently large and representative to encourage Herr Denhof in his missionary efforts.

THE TOUR OF THE SHEFFIELD CHOIR.

Our information as to the doings of Dr. Charles Harriss, Dr. Coward, and the Sheffield Choir in Canada, is confined to Canadian Press notices, enthusiastic in tone, of concerts given at Ottawa on March 30, and a letter from a correspondent in the Manchester Guardian. Two Ottawa critics were struck with the resemblance of the choir's singing to music played upon an organ. One said: 'The choir was an organ and Dr. Coward was the organist. Flutes, strings, reeds, tubas seemed to be forthcoming with the wave of his wand. There was the power of the full organ and the wistful whisper of the æoline or the vox humana. The crescendo pedal lifted the volume of tone from the one to the other with a smoothness that set one's nerves tingling. A beautiful phrase for the tenors or the altos was brought out as distinctly as if the organist had a separate manual at his disposal. The attack was as precise as the electro-pneumatic device of a modern instrument.' The other writer unfortunately referred to the singing of Dudley Buck's 'O Gladsome Light' from 'The Golden Legend' (!). The feature of the choir's activities in Ottawa was a visit to the House of Commons, where they sang to a crowded gathering of members.

The Manchester Guardian correspondent considers the choir to be superior in point of vocal tone to the Sheffield Choir that visited Canada in 1908. He expresses some disappointment that the programmes are occasionally beneath the level of the choir and fail to reveal its true artistic capabilities, but draws great satisfaction from the performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius' and the opportunity afforded to Canadians of making the composer's acquaintance for the first time. Sir Edward conducted the work at Toronto, and secured a performance said to be remarkable for its devotional spirit and expressiveness. A 'Coronation Empire Concert' was also given at Toronto. The National Chorus of Toronto, whose conductor is Dr. Albert Ham, took part, and the programme included Dr. Harriss's cantata 'Pan.'

THE 'CHORAL SYMPHONY' AT CAMBRIDGE.

At the third of Dr. Mann's symphony concerts, which took place at the Guildhall, Cambridge, on March 16, the programme was Beethoven's Choral Symphony, and the exponents were the Queen's Hall Orchestra and a choir of 200 voices, under the direction of Sir Henry Wood. The merits of the performance roused the audience to the point of enthusiasm which is rarely felt, or rarely expressed, in Cambridge. The soloists in the Finale were Miss Esta d'Argo, Miss Alice Lakin, Mr. Joseph Cheetham and Mr. Thorpe Bates.

In view of the performance two (serial) lectures on the work were given a few days previously in the Archaeological Museum, by Dr. E. W. Naylor. His description, which was based throughout upon independent researches, was full of interest, and gave abundant proof of the lecturer's close attachment to the Symphony, and of his industry. His analysis of the first movement was closely worked out, and some attractive views were offered on the psychology, as well as the musical contents, of the Finale.

Dr. Naylor pointed out an error frequently appearing in pianoforte arrangements of the Symphony. In the tenth bar from the end of the first movement there is no E, and where E is printed it should be F. Dr. Naylor states that Reinecke, Ulrich, Pauer, Tours and Liszt have fallen into the error.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The wide scope and useful character of the work of this well-established institution were demonstrated at the excellent dinner given to examiners and local representatives at De Keyser's Hotel on April 18. The guests came from near and far, and the speeches told of the prospects of the College and the influence it exerted throughout the Empire. Sir Frederick Bridge presided, and in the course of his introductory speech dwelt upon the importance given to music at the coming Coronation, and he bespoke their sympathy with him in fulfilling his onerous and honourable task. Speeches were made by Mr. G. E. Bambridge, Director of Studies; Dr. C. W. Pearce, Director of Examinations; Mr. Ernest Banks, local secretary, Lowestoft; Dr. T. Lea Southgate, Sir John Runtz, Mr. Shelley Fisher, secretary, and Mr. W. W. Cobbett. The music performed was well-selected, and was not, as is too often the case, over-abundant. Miss Kathleen Lawler sang Max Bruch's 'Ave Maria,' Miss Alice M. Lees played violin solos, and Mr. Sidney H. Sheppard sang. But the most notable contribution to the programme was the remarkably good performance of the 'Molto Allegro, ed Agitato' from Mendelssohn's D minor Pianoforte trio by three young boys: Richard Ball Johnson (pianoforte), Samuel Kutcher (violin), and Giovanni Barbirolli (violoncello), all pupils of the London branch of the College.

Schumann's 'Paradise and the Peri' was given on March 28, under the direction of Dr. H. T. Pringuer, with accompaniment supplied by Mrs. J. R. Blazey at the pianoforte and Mr. Harry Gray at the organ. The orchestral class gave a concert at Queen's Hall on April 6, at which the most striking achievement was that of the violinist, Master Samuel Kutcher. Other soloists who appeared, showing a high standard of ability, were Miss Kathleen Lawler, Miss Lilian Goodson, Miss Agnes Browning, Mrs. Rodolphe Gaillard (vocalists), Miss Dorothy Meallin (violinist),

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC—(continued from page 316.)

Mr. Sidney Sheppard (organist), Miss Briana Prager and Miss Gladys Pearce (pianists). Mr. W. Sachse conducted.

The annual prize-giving took place at Bechstein Hall. The presentations were made by Sir Samuel Scott, M.P., and the Rev. Prebendary E. A. B. Saunders presided.

As a result of the recent examinations, the following scholarships have been granted (in each case for one year with possible renewal). Singing: Edith May Davies, Eva Scarrott Pocock, and Gladys Whitaker. Flute: Margaret Ellen Gibson. Organ: Sidney Herbert Sheppard. Violin: Dorothy Ida Meallin. Free tuition in the double-bass to John H. Silvester. Gladys E. Hewson and Ethel M. Adams highly commended.

The terminal 'demonstration of method' in connection with the training of teachers of music in the above institution, was held on Saturday, April 8, at Messrs. Chappell's rooms, New Bond Street. The illustrations by children included numerous tests in sight-singing, various forms of aural training, musical dictation (including the use of open score and proper clefs), extempore playing, and the actual performance of vocal and instrumental music. A high level of proficiency was shown, and a good audience followed the proceedings with interest. Dr. J. Warriner gave an address, explaining the method pursued. Musical competitions and high-class examinations, he said, were doing much to raise the standard of music in this country, but all this in the long run came back for its ultimate success to the efficiency of the teacher.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

At the concert given on March 30, a choral ballad 'The Song of the English,' by Sir Frederick Bridge, was introduced. The composer is one whose vigorous style fits the patriotic note. The striking words are from 'The Seven Seas,' by Rudyard Kipling. They invite grave and at times dramatic treatment, and in other ways give opportunities of which Sir Frederick has availed himself. 'The Song of the Dead' is an impressive section, and exhibits him at his best. The work was sung with fair animation under the baton of the composer. 'King Olaf' (Elgar) occupied the remainder of the programme. This cantata is one of the composer's most beautiful works. It thoroughly held the attention of the audience on this occasion. The choral sections would have been even more effective if the attack had been more alert and the dynamic contrasts more pronounced. The soloists were Miss Agnes Nicholls, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Edmund Burke (who also sang the baritone solo in the choral ballad). Mr. H. L. Balfour was at the organ.

DR. RICHTER'S RETIREMENT.

There cannot be too many leave-taking concerts conducted by Dr. Richter if they are of the quality of the British Musicians' Pension Fund Concert given at Queen's Hall on March 30, and the farewell concert given to the conductor on April 10, at the same hall. In both cases the instrumental body taking part was the London Symphony Orchestra, which has always preserved a close connection with Dr. Richter since its formation. The programme of the former concert consisted of the 'Flying Dutchman' Overture; Elgar's 'Enigma' Variations; Brahms's second Symphony; and with Miss Muriel Foster (Mrs. Goetz) as vocalist, Mozart's 'Non più di fiori' from 'La clemenza di Tito,' and the 'Angel's farewell' from 'The dream of Gerontius.' The programme of the second consisted of the 'Meistersinger' Overture, Bach's 'Brandenburg' Concerto in G, Brahms's Variations on a theme by Haydn, Elgar's 'Cockaigne' Overture, and Beethoven's seventh Symphony. It need hardly be said that the performances were magnificent. It remains to be regretfully added that the audiences were inadequate to do justice to the occasions.

On the morning of April 10, the rehearsal was enlivened with an interesting ceremony by which the London Symphony Orchestra paid their last tribute of regard for Dr. Richter. Mr. E. F. James, on behalf of the Orchestra, presented a massive silver loving-cup with the inscription: 'Presented to Dr. Hans Richter by the members of the London Symphony Orchestra, April 10, 1911, in remembrance of an artistic association.' An illuminated address was also presented.

Dr. Richter replied in a short speech in which he deprecated the idea that a conductor is heaven-born, and gave acknowledgment of the enjoyment and instruction he had derived from his association with the orchestra. He reserved special praise for Mr. Arthur Payne, who for this occasion had given up the leader's chair to Mr. Ernest Schiever, a former principal under Dr. Richter.

MISS ETHEL SMYTH'S CONCERT

In giving a concert of her own compositions at Queen's Hall on April 1, Dr. Ethel Smyth gave convincing proof—if any was needed—of the exceptional nature of her powers. There are few modern composers whose works could undergo such a test without monotonous effect. The end of the concert was in fact the liveliest part. The programme terminated with the only novelty, a set of three 'Songs of sunrise' for chorus and orchestra, namely, 'Laggard dawn,' written for female voices on a tune by the late Prince Edmond de Polignac; '1910,' a humorous setting of an imaginary conversation carried on between onlookers and participants at a suffrage demonstration; and 'The march of the women,' a broad, 'popular' tune for suffragette processions. The cleverness and originality of '1910' secured a ready encore, and the compelling melody of the 'March' provoked many earnest propagandists in the audience to stand up and join in. The more serious side of Miss Smyth's abilities was exemplified by such choruses as 'Sleepless dreams' and 'Hey nonny no,' by three songs from 'The Wreckers,' and by the two usual orchestral pieces from the same opera. The solo vocalist was Madame Blanche Marchesi, who was joined by a choir of her pupils in the performance of the Benedictus from the Solemn Mass in D. The instrumental body was the London Symphony Orchestra, and the choral body the Crystal Palace Choir, who sang with excellent spirit and precision. Miss Smyth conducted throughout with great ability.

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The concert given on March 25 was notable chiefly for the critical contretemps which grew out of it. A daily contemporary came out with two conflicting reports, which may at least be said to have displayed the paper's breadth of view. The only unusual feature of the concert was the performance of Tchaikovsky's suite 'Le lac des cygnes.' The remainder of the programme was familiar, and included Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Piano-forte concerto, played with great dash and romantic feeling by Mr. Percy Grainger, and some Wagner excerpts.

On April 1, Miss Beatrice Harrison, the violoncellist who has won conspicuous honour abroad, made her first appearance, as a mature artist, in London. She played Lalo's A minor Concerto with an eloquence, warmth of tone and gracefulness of phrasing that compensated for the unattractiveness of the work. In conjunction with her sister, Miss May Harrison, she was also heard in Brahms's Concerto for violin, violoncello and orchestra.

Sir Henry Wood, as usual, conducted both concerts.

GOOD FRIDAY CONCERTS.

The usual features were presented by the popular sacred concerts given in and about London in celebration of Good Friday. Sir Charles Santley and Madame Clara Butt provided the attraction that brought a large audience to the Crystal Palace in the afternoon, and in the evening the Crystal Palace Band, under Mr. Walter W. Hedgcock, and the Band of the Coldstream Guards, under Lieut. Dr. Mackenzie Rogan, took part in a miscellaneous programme. At the Alexandra Palace a double bill was also provided. The Royal Regiment of Artillery, under the direction of Mr. E. C. Stretton, helped to give a miscellaneous concert in the afternoon, and in the evening the Choral and Orchestral Society under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill, gave a performance of 'The Messiah.' The same oratorio was also performed at the Albert Hall by the Royal Choral Society, under Sir Frederick Bridge. The 'Good Friday' music from 'Parsifal' and Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony, were as usual played in the afternoon by the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under Sir Henry Wood. Madame Clara Butt and other well-known artists provided a programme at the same hall in the evening.

London Concerts.

LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY.

Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion is often adopted as a concert-work in the provinces, but London has yet to become as familiar with performances of the work under these conditions as with performances in the form of a church service. There is every good reason, therefore, why Mr. Fagge should give the work a permanent place in the repertory of the London Choral Society. This organization gave its second performance of the Passion at Queen's Hall on April 5, and sang the choruses and chorales with considerable insight into their requirements. The interpretation was an advance on that of last year, both in reverential treatment and in choral technique. The all-important tenor music had an ideal exponent in Mr. Gervase Elwes, the other soloists being Miss Esta d'Argo, Miss Effie Martyn and Mr. Plunket Greene. A spinet was used for the accompaniments to the recitatives.

Last year we put on record that the highest achievement of the Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society was obtained in the performance of Bach's B minor Mass, and on March 25 it was our privilege to confirm the impression. The performance given on this occasion had again all the splendid sonority that the choir can produce, and all the expressiveness, precision and vitality they have learned to command at the will of their conductor, Mr. Allen Gill. The organist was as usual Mr. G. D. Cunningham, and the soloists were Miss Gladys Honey, Miss Alice Lakin, Mr. Alfred Heather and Mr. Robert Radford.

A Bach concert was given at Westminster Cathedral Hall on April 3, by the Cathedral choir, which, under the careful training of Mr. R. R. Terry, has earned a reputation for its artistic singing. Its rich tone and excellent choral discipline were shown in the cantatas 'Weinen, Klagen,' 'Uns ist ein Kind geboren,' and the eight-part motet 'The Spirit also helpeth us.' The programme included a motet 'From Harmony,' by Mr. Filson Young. The Concerto in C minor, for two pianofortes, with string accompaniment, was played by Miss Irene Scharrer and Mr. W. Sewell. Mr. Terry conducted, and made some preliminary remarks upon the music in the programme.

The Oriana Madrigal Society continued their praiseworthy efforts with a concert at Bechstein Hall on April 6. Their programme of madrigals included Weelkes's 'Cease, sorrow, now,' Thomas Vantor's 'Sweet Suffolk owl,' Cavendish's 'Come, gentle swains,' and Campion's 'Out of my soul's depths.' They also sang Purcell's 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day.' Solo music was provided by Miss Grainger Kerr and Miss Marie Houghton, and the conductors were Mr. Charles Kennedy Scott and Mr. Jackson Byles.

The annual West-end concert of the Oxford House Musical and Dramatic Association took place at Queen's Hall on April 4, in the presence of H.R.H. Princess Christian and H.H. Princess Marie Louise of Schleswig Holstein. The choir sang with enthusiasm and bright tone Schubert's 'Song of Miriam' and Stanford's 'Phauidrig Crohoore' under the direction of Mr. Cuthbert Kelly, the orchestra played Humperdinck's 'Hänsel und Gretel' overture and other pieces, the Excelsior Boys' Club sang unison songs, and Miss Edith Evans contributed solos.

NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Landon Ronald is a conductor who stamps his own personality upon all that he undertakes. His interpretations of the works of Beethoven included in the programme of the New Symphony Orchestra's concert at Queen's Hall on March 29 were no exception. His readings did not perhaps tally with preconceived ideas, but they always made a strong claim to admiration. The works chosen were the 'Egmont' and 'Leonore' No. 3 overtures, and the seventh Symphony, which was performed with much nervous energy and spirit, and always with precision and rhythmic life. The Misses Satz played a Bach Concerto for two pianofortes and orchestra.

The orchestral class at the Guildhall School of Music gave their first concert under the direction of Mr. Landon Ronald on March 31, and soon showed the benefit of his teaching. Beethoven's eighth Symphony and Weber's 'Oberon' Overture were played with admirable precision, unity and spirit. The soloists were Miss Audrey Richardson (violinist) and Mr. William Cooper (vocalist).

Miss Gwynne Kimpton's well-devised series of 'Concerts for young people' came to an end on March 31. Miss Gifford spoke on Form, and the programme included the first movement from Beethoven's first Symphony, Beethoven's C minor Pianoforte concerto, with Mr. Herbert Fryer as soloist, and Wagner's 'Siegfried Idyll.' Our report of the previous concert was wrongly placed under the heading 'Amateur orchestras.'

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAS.

The first movement from a 'Symphonie Spirituelle' for strings, by Ager Hamerik, was played by the North London Orchestral Society at their concert given on March 28 at Queen's Hall. The playing throughout the programme, which included Brahms's D minor Concerto, with Mr. R. H. Walthew as soloist, was characterized by expressiveness. Mr. Lennox Clayton conducted.

The Strolling Players, under Mr. Joseph Ivey, introduced a new overture, 'Mr. Midshipman Easy,' by Mr. Hubert Bath, at their concert given at Queen's Hall on March 30; it proved an excellently written work, characteristic of the composer's lighter style. Miss Marjorie Haywood played Bruch's D minor Violin concerto.

To increase their funds, with a view to further concert-giving in poorer neighbourhoods, the Audrey Chapman Orchestra gave a concert under the direction of Mr. René Ortmans at Queen's Hall on April 3. Dvorák's D minor Symphony, Op. 70, was revived for the occasion, and well played. The Misses Harrison provided solo music.

An exceptionally interesting programme was chosen by the Stock Exchange Orchestral and Choral Society for their concert at Queen's Hall on April 6, and it was carried out to excellent effect under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill (orchestral) and Mr. Munro Davison (choral). It included Dr. Walford Davies's 'Solemn melody,' Haydn's Symphony in G, Wormser's 'L'enfant prodigue' suite, the overture to Stanford's 'Shamus O'Brien,' Elgar's 'Feasting I watch,' Cornelius's 'The old soldier's dream,' and Hegar's 'The phantom host.' Miss Carmen Hill gave solos.

VOCAL RECITALS.

Mr. Hugo Heinz secured the assistance of the New Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Landon Ronald, for his concert at Queen's Hall on March 27, in which Miss Mary Grey, Miss Bessie Tyas, Miss Ada Boskowitz, Mr. Herbert Burnage and Mr. Morgan Kingston also took part. On the same evening, Mr. Albert Maiden, tenor soloist at St. Paul's Cathedral, gave a pleasant recital at Steinway Hall; violin solos were played by Master Willie Davies.

Mr. Theodore Byard chose a comprehensive programme for his recital at Bechstein Hall on March 29, and sang with unfailing versatility. Fraülein Lulu Mysz-Gmeiner gave a recital at the same hall on March 30, and displayed unusual temperamental qualities. A mezzo-soprano voice of attractive quality was revealed by Miss Eunice Grounds at Æolian Hall on April 3, and considerable expressive power was shown by Miss Edith Lowe at Bechstein Hall on April 5.

M. Leon Rains, Court singer to the King of Saxony, gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on April 4, and showed himself an artist of exceptional powers; his voice is a bass.

Miss Alice Mandeville carried out a varied programme at Bechstein Hall on April 10.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

These have again abounded, and as a rule have helped to justify the criticism of the typical pianoforte recital made in another column. There have, however, been exceptions.

Mr. Howard-Jones again called attention to his pre-eminence as a Brahms player at Bechstein Hall on March 27. Mr. Frank Hutchens, a young player from New Zealand, interpreted Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 111, and César Franck's 'Prelude, Chorale et Fugue,' at the same hall on March 31, and showed high promise. Mr. Thomas Fielden, a young pianist of much promise and attainment, gave his first recital at Bechstein Hall on April 5, and introduced, at the beginning of his programme, four Rhapsodies by Dohnányi, Op. 11. He also played Debussy, Chopin, and Mozart, and finished with Beethoven's 'Appassionata Sonata.' His readings were always spirited, expressive and interesting. Madame Rose Koenig gave one of the Wagner transcription recitals that she has made her own speciality, at Leighton House on April 6.

Recitals were given at Bechstein Hall by Mr. Frederic Lamond (March 25), Madame Frickenhaus (March 29), Miss Ella Spravka (March 30), M. Moiseiwitsch (April 8); at Æolian Hall by Miss Ellinor Lloyd (March 27), M. Marcian Thalberg (March 28 and April 4), Mr. Leonard Borwick, perhaps pre-eminent amongst English pianists (March 29 and April 5), Miss Kathleen Chabot (March 30), Mr. Wesley Weyran (March 31), and M. Alfred Cortot (March 31); at Queen's Hall, by M. Pachmann (April 8).

OTHER CONCERTS AND RECITALS.

Mr. Herbert Withers (violinist) and his wife, Miss Marguerite Elzy (pianist) were heard, after a long absence, on March 23, at a Broadwood Concert, given in Æolian Hall. Both strengthened their claims to high esteem.

M. Zacharewitsch gave the first of a series of 'concerts intimes' at his studio, 46, Berners Street, on March 25. His programme included Bach's 'Chaconne,' which he played superbly, and a Violin and pianoforte sonata by Mrs. M. E. Marshall, which the composer accompanied.

Bach's 'Chaconne' was also played with a more feminine expression but no less precision and mastery, by Herr Bronislaw Hubermann at Queen's Hall, on March 28.

Beethoven's Sextet in E flat for strings and two horns, Op. 81b, was revived by Miss Helen Sealy at Bechstein Hall on March 28. The horn players were Mr. A. Borsdorf and Mr. T. R. Busby.

Mr. Fritz Hirt, a Swiss violinist, gave his first recital at Bechstein Hall on April 3. His performance of Bach's A minor Sonata was alone sufficient to stamp him as an artist of high rank.

M. Francesco Chiaffitelli, a Brazilian violinist, made his first appearance in this country at Steinway Hall, on April 4, and showed considerable gifts. Songs were sung by Miss Annie Grew.

Mrs. Douglas Scott gave a pleasant violin recital at Æolian Hall on April 4, with Mozart's Concerto in D and Bach's unaccompanied Suite in E, as the chief numbers in the programme.

The Alfred Roth Trio gave the first English performance of a well-written if not highly inspired Trio by Mr. Gustav Hägg at Steinway Hall on April 5.

Miss Teresa del Riego gave a concert of her own compositions at Bechstein Hall on April 6.

Miss Beatrice Overton (vocalist) and Mr. Adolf Waterman (pianist), the latter new to London, gave a joint recital at Bechstein Hall on April 19, and both showed ability.

Brahms's Sonata in E flat, Op. 120, for clarinet and pianoforte, and other works for the same combination, were played by Mr. Charles Draper at Steinway Hall on April 8.

The Walenn Quartet gave a concert at Æolian Hall on April 10, playing Mr. Frank Bridge's Phantasy and Quartets by Dvořák (Op. 106) and Dittersdorf (in E flat).

A 'Concerto' for pianoforte, violin and string quartet was played at Æolian Hall on March 28, with M. Alfred Cortot and M. Jacques Thibaud as the soloists. The work was one of great interest, apart from the unusual combination, and would repay frequent performance. The artists mentioned were also heard together in Violin and pianoforte sonatas by Fauré and Franck. They gave a second concert on April 8, with Schubert's Duo, Op. 162, Schumann's Sonata, Op. 105, and Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 30, No. 2, as their programme, which they carried out admirably.

A symphonic tone-picture by Mr. Morton Stephenson based upon the Creation, and an overture, 'Over the hills,' by Mr. Percy Bowie, were produced at an orchestral concert given by the Royal Academy of Music, at Queen's Hall, on April 7.

Six of Stainer's songs, with Miss Carrie Lanceley as vocalist, and quartets by Debussy, Alick Maclean and H. Waldo Warner, with the New Quartet as exponents, were included in the programme of the concert given at the Palladium on Sunday, April 16.

Suburban Concerts.

The Edmonton (All Saints') Choral Society terminated their ninth season with a successful performance of 'The Messiah,' with a fairly full orchestra, at the Town Hall, on March 23. The solo portions were sung by Miss Louie Brooks, Miss Irene Whitmore, Mr. George Foxon and Mr. Arthur Earle. Mr. B. J. Hales conducted.

At their concert on March 25, at the Crystal Palace, the Dulwich Philharmonic Society performed Miss Frances Allitsen's dramatic cantata 'For the Queen,' Mascagni's 'Cavalleria Rusticana' and a scene (with Mr. Frank Mullings as vocalist) from 'Carriethura,' by the conductor, Mr. Julius Harrison, whose abilities in the double capacity were shown in a highly favourable light by the occasion.

The Streatham and South London String Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Sydney Robjohns, gave their first concert in the Streatham Hall on March 31. The programme included works by Grieg, Tchaikovsky, Ole Olsen, and others, and a new work by Melvin Nightingale—a setting of Walt Whitman's 'Sea-drift' for recitation, baritone solo and string orchestra—the recitation and baritone solo being sung by the composer. Miss Dorothy Cook-Smith (vocalist) and Mr. Claude Gascoigne (pianist) took part.

A concert was given in the Theatre at Claybury by the Loughton Choral Society and orchestra, on April 1, under the direction of Mr. Henry Riding. Clay's 'Lalla Rookh' (selection) and a miscellaneous second part made up the programme. Mr. E. Cuthbert Nunn accompanied.

The programme of the Chiswick and Gunnersbury Philharmonic Society's second concert (fourth season), at Chiswick Town Hall, on April 4, included 'The Ancient Mariner,' by John Francis Barnett, and a Coronation anthem, 'The King shall rejoice,' for solo, full choir, orchestra, and organ, by Mr. David M. Davis, who is the able conductor of the Society. The vocalists were Miss Florence Holderness, Miss Winifred Collins, Mr. Herbert Groves, and Mr. Jackson Potter.

The Streatham Hill Choral Society gave a performance of 'The Golden Legend' (Sullivan) and 'The Revenge' (Stanford) on April 4, under the direction of Mr. Edwin J. Quance. The choir showed evidence of thorough rehearsal, and sustained a high level of excellence. The soloists were Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs, and Mr. Thorpe Bates—and a full professional orchestra was led by Mr. R. Gray. The Rt. Hon. The Earl of Lonsborough has consented to become President of the Orchestra for this year.

The Ealing Choral and Orchestral Society gave their second concert of the season on April 5, with an admirable performance of 'Elijah' by the choir and orchestra of 160. The soloists were Miss Dora Barrington, Miss Jessie Goldsack, Mr. J. Reed and Mr. Herbert Hegner. Mr. Albert Thompson conducted.

The forty-third concert of the Borough of Woolwich Orchestral Society was held at the Town Hall on Good Friday. The orchestra, numbering over seventy performers, under the conductorship of Mr. Sidney Horton, gave an excellent performance of Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony and the overture to 'Tannhäuser.' The vocalists were Miss Winifred Crocker and Mr. Fred Shaw.

CHORAL UNIONS.

Three of the L.C.C. Evening Continuation Schools' Choral Unions have given concerts. On April 5 the Battersea, Clapham, and Wandsworth Choral Union (Mr. George Lane) sang 'Hiawatha's departure' (Coleridge-Taylor) and 'The Pied Piper of Hamelin' (Perry), and part-songs. On April 8 'The May Queen' (Sterndale Bennett) and miscellaneous works were given by the East London Choral Union (Mr. G. Day Winter), and on the same evening 'Judas Macabaeus' and MacCunn's 'The Wreck of the Hesperus' were the chief works in the programme given by the Hackney and Finsbury Choral Union (Mr. Allen Gill). Reports of these concerts are given in the School Music Review for this month.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BATH.

On March 28, the Bath Choral and Orchestral Society gave an excellent performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius,' at the Assembly Rooms. The performance was regarded with special gratification by the choir, who have rehearsed the work carefully; and seventy-six of their number, with Mr. H. T. Sims (conductor), went to Bristol in the preceding week to hear the Bristol Choral Society's interpretation. The soloists were Miss Palgrave-Turner, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. David Hughes, who were equal to the demands made upon the principal vocalists by the composer.

BELFAST.

A detachment of the Hallé Orchestra, with Dr. Richter as conductor, visited Belfast on March 17 (under the auspices of Mr. H. B. Phillips) and, as might be expected, attracted a large audience. The programme was admirable, with Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 as its kernel. A very clever young violinist, Anton Maskoff, who should go far, played Saint-Saëns's Concerto No. 3 in a manner that disarmed criticism.

The last concert of the Philharmonic season, on March 24, was occupied entirely with Berlioz's 'Faust,' the soloists being Miss Mabel Manson and Messrs. James Hay and Robert Burnett. The performance was a very creditable one, considering the difficulties of the work, both for choir and orchestra.

Dr. Lawrence Walker's fourth chamber concert, on April 3, was not ambitious in its pretensions. The programme included Dvorák's Sonata for violin (Miss Winifred Burnett) and pianoforte (Mr. F. H. Sawyer), both of Belfast, Violoncello sonata by Marcello, played by Miss Mary McCulloch (Manchester), and Trio, Op. 15, Smetana. Miss Jessie Sherrard was the vocalist.

BIRMINGHAM.

The local musical season is drawing to a close, and the various series of concerts organized by our different musical bodies have come to an end, but there are to be recorded several important events of more than ordinary interest which helped to make the season one of remarkable activity and which have not been touched upon previously.

The Birmingham Symphony Orchestra gave a popular Orchestral Concert in the Town Hall on March 18, under a new conductor, Mr. Julian Clifford, of the Harrogate Symphony Orchestra, who is evidently a master of his art, judging by the way he interpreted Weber's Overture to 'Oberon,' Tchaikovsky's 'Caprice Italien' Berlioz's 'Hungarian March,' from 'Faust,' the Overture to 'Tannhäuser,' and Liszt's second 'Hungarian Rhapsody.' In addition to these he conducted an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's Violin concerto, the solo part being played by a remarkably gifted violinist, Miss Edith Smeraldina, a pupil of the late Dr. Joachim, and a native of Hungary. The vocal interludes included 'Elizabeth's greeting,' and two melodious songs, 'The rose will blow,' by Wilton King, and the conductor's own 'A song of Spring,' sung by the Hon. Mrs. Julian Clifford with perfect art and in a pleasing voice.

The same Orchestra arranged a concert in aid of their Benevolent Fund, given in the Town Hall on March 28, which was to have been conducted by Mr. Thomas Beecham, but owing to illness he was compelled to cancel the engagement. The management, however, were fortunately able again to secure the services of Mr. Julian Clifford to conduct this special concert, which was of more than ordinary interest inasmuch as the programme included Sir Edward Elgar's Violin concerto, heard here for the first time. Mr. Zacharewitsch was the soloist, who had already at Liverpool played the Concerto with enormous success. His performance was ideal in expression and phrasing, and his tone was responsive and pure. The Concerto created a deep impression, and the performer was five times recalled. The orchestral accompaniment, a symphonic poem in itself, was well given for a first attempt. Songs were contributed by Miss Dorothy Silk.

On March 20, a new amateur musical organization, the Birmingham Orchestral Society, gave its first concert in the Temperance Hall, under its trainer and conductor, Mr. Arthur Cooke, a local pianist and teacher. The hall does not lend itself acoustically to an orchestral concert, but one was nevertheless able to judge of the orchestra's capabilities, which promise greater things in the future. One of the best things given was Coleridge-Taylor's picturesque 'Petite suite de Concert,' not heard in public previously. Of the four movements, the first received the best exposition. At this concert the Birmingham Ladies' Glee Party, conducted by Mr. Hall Rose, contributed several concerted vocal pieces, including Anderton's 'Ode to Autumn,' with fair success. Mr. Samuel Masters sang the 'Preislied,' and Schubert's 'Die Allmacht,' displaying a voice of great power and resonance.

Lectures on Plainchant were given under the auspices of the University, on March 21, 28, and April 4, by Mr. S. Royle Shore, whose remarks treated the subject in a practical aspect and were addressed 'to the clergy, organists, choir-singers, and others interested in the subject.'

Madame Minadiou's concert, given at the Temperance Hall on March 22, was of more than ordinary interest, as it introduced Debussy's 'The Blessed Damsel,' originally written for soli, female chorus and orchestra, but on this occasion performed to a pianoforte accompaniment. It was interpreted by a choir of thirty-five ladies' voices, and the soli were sung by Miss Dorothy Silk and Miss Amy Bosworth, the whole performance being quite admirable and effective. Mr. Clarence Raybould was the accompanist, and Mr. Rutland Boughton conducted.

Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion was performed in its complete form at the Birmingham Cathedral, the first part being given on March 24 and the second on the following evening. The performance was deeply impressive, and full of devotional spirit. Mr. Edwin Stephenson conducted, and was also responsible for its admirable preparation, Mr. T. Appleby Matthews gave the organ part, and Dr. Reynolds accompanied the 'recitativo continuo' on an old instrument of the nature of a clavichord. The choral portions were sung with an augmented double choir supported by an efficient orchestra according to requirements. The Cathedral was crowded at each function to its utmost holding capacity.

The Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association's last concert of the current series took place at the Town Hall on April 1, and at short notice was conducted by Mr. A. J. Cotton, owing to the serious illness of Mr. Joseph Adams, the conductor of the Society. The principal feature of the concert was the first performance in Birmingham of Coleridge-Taylor's sparkling and melodious 'Bon-bon choral suite,' written for baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra, words by Thomas Moore. One was glad to make its acquaintance, for the composer has always something interesting in his compositions that appeals to all classes of music-lovers. His part-writing is always full of life and verve, and his instrumentation full of colour and attractiveness. The performance, however, lacked temperament, and much of its exhilarating spirit was therefore lost. Mr. Sidney Stoddard gave the baritone solos with good effect. The programme also comprised a number of orchestral items, the best rendered being Sibelius's 'Finlandia.'

In connection with the Midland Institute School of Music, the Stourbridge Institute Male-voice Choir, winners of the challenge shield at the Blackpool competition festival, 1910, gave a concert in the large Lecture Theatre of the Midland Institute on April 1. This excellent body of singers, one of the finest male-voice choirs yet heard in Birmingham, was conducted by Mr. G. H. Woodhall. The selections given comprised Elgar's 'Feasting, I watch,' Schumann's 'The night march,' Beethoven's 'Creation's hymn,' Elgar's 'It's oh! to be a wild wind' and the 'Reveille,' Bantock's 'The lost leader,' Coleridge-Taylor's, 'O mariners, out of the sunlight,' and Grieg's 'Landerkenning.' Violin solos were given by Mr. Arthur Hytch, and the accompanist was Mr. Clarence Raybould.

Gounod's sacred trilogy 'The Redemption' was once more chosen by the Midland Musical Society for the annual Good Friday evening concert given at the Town Hall under Mr. A. J. Cotton's conductorship. Since its production at the Birmingham Triennial Festival of 1882, this favourite oratorio has with a few exceptions figured as the principal attraction here on Good Friday. The work is now so familiar with the choir and orchestra that there is no need to offer any fresh comment. The solos were assigned to Madame Laura Taylor, Miss Olive Pank, Miss Elsie Palmer, Mr. Ernest Ludlow, Mr. Ernest Quinton, and Mr. Henry Bannister. Mr. C. W. Perkins was the organist. Messrs. Dale & Forty, who have now entered the arena of local impresari, secured the services of M. Vladimir de Pachmann for a pianoforte recital at the Town Hall on March 27, prior to his extended tour through the United States.

The Birmingham Festival Choral Society chose for their closing concert of the present series Bach's B minor Mass, given in the Town Hall, April 6, under the conductorship of Dr. Sinclair, who is to be complimented upon the magnificent performance he gave. Certainly within the history of our local premier choral Society, nothing greater has been accomplished, although one recalls with delight the magnificent rendering of Beethoven's Mass in D. This choir completely carried off the honours of the evening, and if for nothing else the touching exposition of the 'Crucifixus' and the spirited and animated performance of the 'Sanctus,' will always stand out as a marvellous achievement on the part of these singers. The soli were entrusted to Madame Emily Squire, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Alfred Heather and Mr. Robert Radford, but it cannot be said that their singing made a marked impression. Mr. C. W. Perkins gave valuable help at the organ.

BOURNEMOUTH.

First performances of new compositions have been somewhat prevalent of late at the Winter Gardens concerts. The programme of the twenty-sixth Classical Concert of the current series, on April 3, was headed by a Coronation March by Mr. Mauritz Speelman; the music is tuneful and direct, but it has no great originality. Mr. Dan Godfrey's energies were also employed in such authoritative works as Beethoven's C minor Symphony, Stanford's 'Irish Rhapsody' No. 1, and Sinigaglia's Overture 'Le Baruffe Chiozzotte.' The concert concluded with an effective performance by Messrs. King-Hall, Robinson, Alberts, and Zeelander of a portion of a Mozart String quartet.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie's annual visit took place on April 6, when the larger share of Symphony Concert No. 27 was given into his keeping. Interest chiefly centred in the distinguished composer's Air de Ballet, entitled 'La Savannah,' which was then heard for the first time; the composition is admittedly of an extremely light nature. Sir Alexander also brought forward his melodious 'La belle dame sans merci' Ballad, and the hilarious 'Hamstead Heath' excerpt from his 'London day by day,' all being well played under the composer's careful direction. Mr. Dan Godfrey took charge of the remainder of the programme, which included Saint-Saëns's Violin concerto in B minor, played by Miss Dorothy Bridson.

On April 10, a tone-poem on the subject of Othello, by Mr. Keyser, was presented; the strenuousness of the work was perhaps over-persistent, but on the other hand a keen sense of dramatic effect was apparent, and the orchestration was effective.

On April 7, a large number of local performers generously tendered their services at a concert given in aid of the late Madame Newling, who was then lying very seriously ill. The hall was very well filled, and the sum raised was a substantial one. Madame Newling's choir joined forces with the Municipal Orchestra, Mr. Dan Godfrey conducting, in a bright rendering of the chorus 'Hail! Bright abode' from Wagner's 'Tannhäuser.' A composer-conductor was to hand in the person of Mr. Hadley Watkins, who led the choir through his expressive composition 'How sweet the moonlight sleeps.' The Orpheus Glee Society, under the direction of Mr. Herbert J. Nash, took part.

BRISTOL.

On March 25, the Bristol Choral Society held an Elgar Night, at Colston Hall, and there was a large attendance. The choir and orchestra, numbering 500, under the able direction of Mr. George Riseley, gave satisfactory interpretations of the works selected. In the first part of the concert 'The Dream of Gerontius' was given, and deeply impressed the hearers. Mr. G. Herbert Riseley was at the organ, and the soloists were Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Samuel Bishop (Exeter Cathedral). The second part of the concert comprised the overture 'Froissart,' and the choral songs 'From the Bavarian Highlands.' Miss Phyllis Lett also sang two songs from 'Sea-Pictures' acceptably.

Bristol Symphony Orchestra gave the concluding concert for the season on March 21, at the Victoria Rooms. Mr. F. S. Gardner was the leader, and Mr. Herbert Parsons directed the performance. The chief work presented was Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony. This was admirably executed and won hearty applause from a large audience. Mr. H. Lane Wilson was the vocalist.

The Bristol Royal Orpheus Glee Society, on March 30, by invitation gave a concert in the Bingham Hall, Cirencester, in aid of the Cottage Hospital. The choir, who numbered seventy performers, were assisted by Miss Gertrude Winchester, and under the direction of Mr. George Riseley delighted by the admirable manner in which they interpreted a well-selected programme.

There was a crowded audience at the Victoria Rooms on April 1, when the Bristol Musical Society performed Gounod's 'Redemption.' The choir and band numbered 300, augmented by fifty boys specially trained by Mr. C. W. Stear, who conducted the concert. The principal soloists were Miss Norah Newport, Miss Gertrude Winchester, Mr. J. S. Perry (Exeter Cathedral), Mr. J. Coleman (Lichfield Cathedral), and Mr. Alfred Parkman. Mr. F. S. Gardner was leader, and Mr. Hubert Hunt (Bristol Cathedral) was at the electric organ.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

On March 22, at the last but one of Mr. R. G. Evans's present series of Symphony Concerts in Plymouth Guildhall, the chief works were Dvorák's 'From the New World' Symphony, of which a very good performance was given, and Grieg's A minor Pianoforte concerto, in which Miss Florence Smith gave a beautiful interpretation of the solo part. A novelty was a suite for orchestra, 'Callirhoe,' by Chaminade. Mr. David Parkes was the vocalist. In the evening of the same day, 'Judas Maccabæus' was sung by the Ebenezer Wesleyan Choir, augmented for the occasion, and supported by a band, with Mr. C. S. Parsonson at the organ. Mr. David Parkes conducted, and obtained excellent results from the well-balanced choir. On March 23 the Orpheus Quartet, and an orchestra conducted by Mr. H. E. Dyer-Smith, joined the Devonport Y.M.C.A. Choral Society in a miscellaneous programme. Mention must be made of the two organ recitals given on the fine instrument in Plymouth Guildhall, on April 4, by Mr. David Clegg. Sacred cantatas have been given during Lent in several churches; this development of church music being deserving of encouragement. 'The way of the Cross' (Ferris Tozer) was sung in St. Simon's Church on April 5, with Mr. W. G. Nelder at the organ; and on the following date, Maunders's 'From Olivet to Calvary' was given in St. Thomas's Mission Chapel by members of the choir of the Parish (St. Andrew's) Church, conducted by Mr. B. Crocker and assisted by a small band. 'The Saviour of men' was given in Embankment Road United Methodist Free Church on April 9, with Mr. W. H. Martin conducting and Mr. C. Jane leading a small band. Simultaneously, an impressive rendering was given in Mutley Wesleyan Church of 'The Crucifixion,' with Mr. J. W. Wibberley as conductor, Mr. David Parkes as organist, and Messrs. Will Foster and Sydney Smith as soloists.

TORQUAY.

The fifteenth concert of the Haydn String Quartet on March 23 was the occasion of highly enjoyable interpretations of Mozart's work in D minor, and Grieg's in G minor (Op. 27). Mr. J. P. Curran was the vocalist. The Musical Association gave their thirty-seventh concert on April 6, Mr. J. H. Webb conducting. The choir gave an excellent account of themselves in Mendelssohn's 'First Walpurgis Night,' and with much refinement of tone and phrasing sang madrigals. The orchestra played the overtures 'Leonora,' No. 3 (Beethoven) and 'Jubel' (Weber). The combined forces, choral and orchestral, numbered 130.

CORNWALL.

At the annual meeting of Camborne Choral Society, on March 27, a regrettable deficit was reported, but it was decided to continue work under the conductorship of Mr. H. V. Pearce. The St. Austell Prize Quartet (Messrs. A. Blight, E. C. George, T. Philipps, and G. Varcoe) sang unaccompanied pieces on April 3, to an appreciative audience. The united parish choirs of Calstock combined to sing 'The Crucifixion,' at Harrowbarrow, on April 7.

DUBLIN.

On April 3, Miss Nora Thomson's String Quartet (including Miss Madeleine Moore, Mons. Grisard, and Mr. Clive Twelvemiss) gave a recital in the Aberdeen Hall. The programme consisted of Tchaikovsky's Op. 11 and (with Herr A. Geblert) Mozart's Clarinet quintet. Miss Madeleine Macken sang Brahms's two songs with viola obbligato (Mons. Grisard).

On April 5, the Dublin Orchestral Society gave a Shakespeare concert in the Gaieity Theatre. The programme consisted of Schumann's 'Julius Cæsar' Overture; Liszt's symphonic-poem 'Hamlet'; Beethoven's 'Coriolanus' Overture; Berlioz's 'Love scene' from 'Romeo and Juliet'; Dr. Esposito's 'Othello' Overture; and Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer night's Dream' incidental music. The Liszt, Berlioz, and Schumann pieces were done for the first time here, and not the least interesting item was the 'Othello' Overture by the conductor of the Society. It is a powerful and dramatic musical impression of the play, and is beautifully scored for the orchestra.

On April 6, the Philharmonic Society gave a performance of the 'Messiah.' A small but efficient band played the accompaniments, but the lack of an organ or other instrument to fill in the figured-bass part was much felt. The soloists were Madame Borel, Miss Eileen Stephens, Mr. Albert Maltby (Chester), and Mr. Percy Whitehead. The first and last named especially acquitted themselves with distinction. Mr. Charles Marchant conducted, except during 'God save the King,' which the band and choir sang without a conductor during the entry of His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, before the conductor appeared!

On April 10, in the Theatre Royal, Mr. Vincent O'Brien and the Dublin Oratorio Society produced for the first time in Dublin Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius.' Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. Wilfrid Douthitt were the soloists. The oratorio was preceded by Liddle's 'Abide with me,' sung by Miss Phyllis Lett, and Gounod's 'There is a green hill,' sung by Mr. Wilfrid Douthitt. The band was led by Mr. Arthur Darley, and there was a large attendance. Bach's 'Passion' music was sung in St. Patrick's Cathedral during the earlier nights of Holy Week, Mr. Walter Bapty and Mr. Charles Kelly being the soloists, as for many years past.

Madame Melba has just completed a tour of twenty-five concerts throughout the British Isles, at ten of which she had the assistance of Mr. Landon Ronald and the New Symphony Orchestra.

EDINBURGH.

The date (March 21) on which Mr. John Kirkhope's choir concert was given made it impossible to do more than mention it in last month's issue. The concert was devoted to the unaccompanied performance of madrigals and part-songs. The composers drawn upon included Benet, Festa, Gibbons, Morley, Walmisley, Wilbye, Cummings, Elgar, Stanford, and others. The singing of the choir displayed careful training, and the dainty charm which characterizes many of the pieces chosen was brought out in a way which at times quite captivated the audience. Accompanied by Mr. R. W. Pentland, Mr. Watkin Mills sang a number of songs, and Mr. Jean Gerardy contributed violoncello solos which gave additional attraction to the concert.

The Northern Choral Society (conductor, Mr. James A. Crichton) gave meritorious performances of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' and Sir F. Bridge's 'The Flag of England' at their annual concert in the Music Hall on March 27. Mr. Nicol Pentland's preliminary recitation of 'The Flag of England' was much enjoyed. The soloists were Miss Clara Dow, Miss Alison Sharp, and Mr. Sam Hemsall.

Stanford's 'The Revenge' and Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George' were the chief items in the programme at the concert given by the Western Choral Society (conductor, Mr. David Blair) in the Music Hall on March 29. The choir did their work in capital style, and a quintet of strings led by Mr. Dambmann provided the accompaniments.

An excellent concert was given in the Livingstone Hall, on April 1, by the Y.M.C.A. Musical Association. Conducted by Mr. C. A. Grant Dow, the choir gave a satisfactory performance of 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast,' and were also successful in their singing of a number of part-songs and choruses. Songs were sung effectively by Miss Nina Horsburgh, Mr. W. H. Oldham, and Mr. Philip Malcolm. The accompanists were Miss Mary A. Cameron and Mr. W. Anderson.

On April 3 a concert was given by the Amateur Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. T. H. Collinson. The programme included Mozart's 'Hafner' Symphony and Saint-Saëns's G minor Piano-forte concerto (soloist, Miss Alice Howard).

Among concerts given during the month by church musical associations have been: Barclay Church (Stainer's 'Crucifixion' and Saint-Saëns's 'The heavens declare'), conductor, Mr. M. Shirlaw; St. Oswald's Parish Church (Gounod's 'Redemption'), conductor, Mr. Nalborough; Broughton Place Church (Mendelssohn's 'Elijah'), conductor, Dr. W. B. Ross; Roseburn United Free Church (Stainer's 'Daughter of Jairus'), conductor, Mr. John Wishart; St. Paul's United Free Church (Bennett's 'The woman of Samaria'), conductor, Mr. Arthur Snell; Christ Church, Morningside (Weber's 'Messe Solennelle'), conductor, Mr. James A. Caruthers; St. Matthew's Parish Church (Gaul's 'Passion music'), conductor, Mr. F. Huxtable; South Morningside United Free Church (Spohr's 'God, Thou art great, anthems, &c.'), conductor, Mr. J. T. Miller. Orchestral concerts have been given by the Morningside Orchestral Society, conductor, Mr. E. W. Wakelen; the St. George Orchestra, conductor, Mr. W. B. Moonie; the Edinburgh Amateur Orchestral Society, conductor, Mr. T. H. Collinson; and by Mr. James Winram's orchestra.

GLASGOW.

The Glasgow Bach Choir, under the able direction of Mr. J. M. Diack, gave a most meritorious performance of the 'St. Matthew' Passion in the Cathedral on April 4. The choruses were all sung with a high degree of intelligence, but the Choir's best work was done in the great double-chorus, 'Here yet awhile,' which was sung with impressive effect. The chorales were sung by a choir placed at the west door of the Cathedral, and the ripieno chorale in the opening number was given by the boys from St. Mary's Cathedral. The solo vocalists were Miss Marion Richardson, Messrs. Frank J. Webster and Francis Harford, and members of the Choir. Mr. Herbert Walton's masterly work in the organ accompaniments contributed in no small degree to the success of the performance.

The concert by Hamilton Choral Society (conductor, Mr. T. S. Drummond), on April 12, was notable by reason of the first public performance of the conductor's ballad for chorus and orchestra, 'Young Lochinvar,' a work which gained the prize offered by the Glasgow Society of Musicians for the best setting of Scott's stirring verses. The poem lends itself well to musical treatment, and Mr. Drummond has been very happy in his setting. The choral music is eminently singable and effective, and the orchestral part reveals some highly skilful instrumentation. The clever use of the Dorian mode at places gives the composition the true national flavour. The performance received the compliment of an encore. The first part of the programme consisted of a selection from 'Israel in Egypt,' in which the choir was heard to considerable advantage. Mr. Richard Daebnitz led the orchestra, and Mr. J. K. Findlay was organist.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

The Lenten season was observed by the Philharmonic Society in the performance of Brahms's German 'Requiem' given at their twelfth and closing concert of the season on March 21. It is worthy of note that Brahms's great work had not been previously heard here with orchestral accompaniment. In Dr. Cowen's regretted absence through illness, the committee invited Dr. George Henschel to conduct the concert, and this accomplished musician's appreciation of the music was evident. The vocal soloists were Miss Esta D'Arco and Mr. Ivor Foster. The 'Requiem' made a deep impression. The second half of the programme provided a contrast to its sombre tone with the 'Hebrides' Overture, Wagner's 'Rienzi' Overture, and songs.

The Catholic Philharmonic Society gave further evidence of vitality and usefulness by their performance in the Philharmonic Hall, on April 4, of Haydn's 'Passion Music' and Astorga's 'Stabat Mater,' under the careful and competent direction of Mr. H. P. Allen. The well-trained choir of 220 voices, and orchestra of fifty, led by Mr. Akeroyd, with Mr. C. H. Fogg at the organ, found no difficulty with the music, and, as on previous occasions, the singing was marked by intelligence and artistic restraint. The latter quality was generally sought in preference to dramatic effect. The dominating personality of Father Bernard Vaughan gave a fascinating interest to the eloquent and vivid short addresses, with which he relieved any sense of monotony or conventionality in the musical text. The vocal principals were Miss Beatrice Spencer, who distinguished herself in the soprano solos, Miss Florence Christie, Mr. Louis Godfrey, and Mr. A. Foxton Ferguson. Astorga's 'Stabat Mater' was also excellently sung. It is worth reviving if only for the contrapuntal interest of the choral music, especially the unaccompanied 'Eia Mater.'

For the closing concert of their twelfth season, which took place on March 28, the Liverpool and district Methodist Choral Union, conducted by Mr. P. H. Ingram, made an appropriate choice in Gounod's 'Redemption,' of which they gave a highly satisfactory performance. The vocal principals were Miss Olive Clare, Miss Florence Prince, Miss Hilda Cragg-James, Mr. Harold Wilde, and Mr. Hamilton Earle. Gounod's 'Redemption' (Parts 1 and 2) was impressively sung by the Walton Philharmonic Society in Walton Parish Church on March 30, conducted by Mr. Albert Orton; the soloists included Miss Edina Thraves, Miss Annie Beattie, Mr. J. C. Greenlees, and Mr. S. Mann. Mr. Branscombe supplied accompaniments at the organ.

At the concert of the Oxtown and Claughton Orchestral Society in the Birkenhead Town Hall on April 1, a clever performance of the solo part in Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto, Op. 35, was given by Mr. J. E. Matthews, conductor of the Society, and the programme also included two movements from Schubert's Symphony No. 9, in C, and 'Rosamunde' Overture. The vocalist was Mr. Roland Jackson. Mr. Vasco Akeroyd conducted the concerto. On the same evening the Liscard Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. P. R. Smart, gave an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's 'Hebrides' Overture, Weber's Concertante for clarinet and orchestra (Op. 26), played by Mr. E. Mills, Walford Davies's 'Solemn melody' (with Mr. Gordon E. Stuteley as organist), and Dr. Cowen's Suite of English dances. The vocalist was Miss Lilian Dillingham. It is satisfactory to find that growing public appreciation attends the policy and conduct of these representative Societies.

The programme of the Societa Armonica's closing concert on April 8, included Brahms's Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Wagner's 'Faust' Overture, and Sinigaglia's lively little overture 'Le Baruffe Chiozzotte.' A fine performance of Xaver Scharwenka's Pianoforte concerto in B flat minor was given by Mr. Hague Kinsey, an accomplished local pianist, and the orchestra, which Mr. Akeroyd ably conducts. The vocalist was Mr. Harry Alexander. It is satisfactory to note that the concerts are to be resumed next season in the Philharmonic Hall.

Under the auspices of the Art Studies Association, a delightful entertainment was given in the theatre of the David Lewis Hostel on April 7, by the accomplished troupe of players, singers, and dancers, directed by Miss Nellie Chaplin. Their programme of 'Ancient dances and music' gave keen pleasure to an interested audience. The examples of old-world dances given with infinite grace included the Pavane, Galliard, Sarabande, Courante (music by Hooper, 1553-1621), arranged by Dr. T. Lea Southgate; Minuet (Dr. Philip Hayes), scored by F. Cunningham Woods; and Gavotte (Dr. Arne). National dances were grouped in the Tambourin (Rameau), Bourrée (Mouret), Tarantelle (Rossini), Scotch Lilt and Irish Reel. Old English dances were illustrated in 'The glory of the West,' 'Chelsey Reach,' and 'Kettledrum.' String accompaniments were provided by the four ladies of the Quartet led by Miss Kate Chaplin, reinforced by an oboe, excellently played by Miss Leila Bull, whose performance of a Handel Oboe concerto gave distinction to the instrumental selections. The songs by Miss Flora Mann were in keeping with the art and finish of the entire performance.

The principles and working of the Fletcher Music Method were explained by Mrs. Fletcher Cobb to a large audience, including many teachers, in the Rushworth Hall, on April 7. The method by which drudgery is avoided in the early stages of tuition is applied by various sets of apparatus, including blocks which stand as symbols and signs for the notes, lines, and spaces in ordinary music notation. Mrs. Fletcher Cobb, by means of the apparatus and with the help of a number of Liverpool children, gave demonstrations which illustrated and commended the method.

Two pianoforte recitals which attracted considerable attention and appreciation were given by Mr. Frederic Brandon in the Rushworth Hall on April 8 and 22. At one time organist and musical director at Port Sunlight, Mr. Brandon has achieved a recognised place in the ranks of native pianists.

Other recent musical events worthy of record include the vocal recital by Madame Henriette Engelhard, an accomplished local amateur, who was assisted by Miss Helen Mott (violinello).

The usual Good Friday free performance of the 'Messiah,' with organ accompaniment, was given in St. George's Hall to the poor of the city, to whom tickets are distributed by the various ministers of religion. The choir of 230 was recruited from the Philharmonic and other Choral Societies, and the vocal principals were Miss Gertrude Sichel, Miss Sara Silvers, Mr. George Barnett and Mr. Hamilton Earle. Mr. Branscombe conducted, and Dr. A. L. Peace presided at the organ.

The first performance of Berlioz's 'Faust' in Warrington, was given on March 29, by the Warrington Musical Society, who were assisted by the Warrington Male-voice Choir. Including an orchestra of fifty-five, the forces, numbering 300, were ably directed by Mr. F. H. Crossley, and the vocal principals had been well chosen in Miss Emily Breare, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, Mr. J. B. Poole, and Mr. Charles Tree.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

On April 3, under the aegis of our musical Lord Mayor, the subscribers of the Hallé Concerts and other friends presented to Dr. Richter a travelling suit-case, seven silver candlesticks, two silver entrée dishes, and to Mrs. Richter a pair of diamond ear-rings, and to the two Misses Richter gold-watch bracelets. Dr. Richter said: 'It was a hard struggle before I could make up my mind to retire, to give up a work which I have loved, which was my happiness, but as a true servant of my Art I was compelled to do so, having discovered that my services in consequence of the weakness of my health could not be any more useful to my Art as I intended, and as they could be in times of good health. The years I lived here were really years of happiness, and I must thank you for the undisturbed sympathy I have enjoyed here. May I make two requests? Please support my successor with the same sympathy I undisturbedly enjoyed during twelve years, and please continue to patronise the excellent Hallé Orchestra. With these happy remembrances I part from you—I hope not entirely. My intention is at least to come, as long as I can do it, every year to conduct the Pension Fund Concert, and so I say "Auf wiedersehen."

The season just ended has witnessed not only Dr. Richter's retirement, but also that of Mr. Egon Petri, who leaves us for Berlin. At the Hallé Pension Fund concert he played, under Dr. Richter, the César Franck Symphonic Variations, and Liszt's grisly 'Totentanz.' No more ethereally pianissimo tone has been heard in the Free Trade Hall than Petri secured in the Variations, played with such consummate mastery and insight as to reveal the work in quite a fresh light. At the concluding Brodsky Quartet concert, Mr. Petri joined Dr. Brodsky in the Bach F minor Sonata. Both players are unusually fine interpreters of Bach, but approach him from quite opposite points of view, Petri—like his revered exemplar, Busoni—fixing the design of the work in lines of perfect beauty and detail, whilst Brodsky colours it with his greater emotional intensity and warmth. Probably the recital which will stand out in future years as the most illuminative one of the past season will be that at Ancoats, where Petri set before us Busoni as a composer, as one using, to a considerable extent, other men's work, viz., Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt, Meyerbeer, and others. At these Ancoats recitals you get folk who are keen, for the hall is rather inconveniently situated. Player and audience alike dispense with 'evening dress' formalities, and there is the same sort of atmosphere of the big competitive musical festivals, where democracy is getting at close grips with the highest and best in music. Mr. Petri may playfully allude to himself as a 'slum-pianist,' but in years to come his memory will probably dwell upon this aspect of his work here with greatest pride.

One of the most interesting of recent chamber concerts was that of the Musical Society, when Mr. Julius Harrison came, and with help from the College of Music gave us opportunity of gauging his abilities in the D minor Quartet (still in MS.), and the product of the last two years), a prelude and double fugue for two pianofortes, a sonnet for violoncello, and various songs and choral works for female voices. His string writing is uncommonly well laid out for the instruments, and the Violoncello sonnet is of rare intimate beauty.

On April 5, an excellent performance of Berlioz's 'Faust' was given at Warrington, under the direction of Mr. F. H. Crossley.

At the last concert of the Speelman Promenades, Miss Phyllis Lett displayed still another side of her art in the three new songs of Elgar (introduced here a year back by Mrs. Ludovic Goetz), and it would need nice judgment to say in which she excels most—Bach, 'Omar,' or the latest Elgar, all of which she has done here in the past season. Choral concerts have not been numerous; possibly the newly-formed male-voice choir at Salford, conducted by Mr. David Grundy, may in time achieve good results.

At the final concert of Mr. Brand Lane's series, the Philharmonic Choir sang Bach's motet 'Praise Jehovah,' and numerous part-songs. Mr. H. P. Allen's Catholic Philharmonic Society, which operates in both Manchester and Liverpool, sang appropriate Lenten music at their second concert, their conductor having disinterestedly Astorga's setting of the 'Stabat Mater,' and linked with this was Haydn's 'Passion Music'—an interesting study in contrasts—Father Bernard Vaughan bringing exceptional gifts as orator in the latter work. The Cathedral authorities repeated much of the Bach 'St. Matthew' Passion music, some of the Hallé Choir, sitting in the congregation, singing the chorales. The Manchester Vocal Society's members have had a strenuous season necessitated by the transition from the older style as practised under the late Dr. Watson to the modern methods of Mr. H. Whittaker. If the attendance of the public is any criterion at all, the new wine is preferred to the old. Miss Alice Dill, a student of the Royal College here, has composed some part-songs of distinct merit and individuality, and one (to Fiona Macleod's 'O would I were the cool wind') was given with great success by this choir. Brahms's 'Zigeunerlieder' quartets were also sung by solo voices, a marked advance on any solo concerted music before given.

At Preston and Blackburn, Dr. Bairstow's societies gave respectively 'The Golden Legend' and 'The dream of Gerontius,' but the Blackburn Exchange Hall is a serious handicap to the production of works on the scale of 'Gerontius,' the fullest resources being impossible of employment. Here and in the neighbouring manufacturing centres of Accrington, Bolton, and Burnley, chamber music societies flourish exceedingly. At Morecambe and Lancaster preparations are in progress for choral performances under Mr. J. W. Aldous and Mr. Harry Evans at the forthcoming festival, among the works to be heard being Haydn's 'Creation' and Walford Davies's 'Hervé Riel.' At Warrington there was a happy union of the forces of the town Choral Society and of the male-voice choir conducted by Mr. Nesbitt (of Manchester) for the performance of Berlioz's 'Faust,' under the direction of the Choral Society's conductor, Mr. F. H. Crossley.

The amateur orchestral societies in Bolton, Blackburn, Oldham, Rochdale, and Withington (Manchester), have concluded a strenuous year's work, and in all cases useful and encouraging results have been attained. For the annual operatic production by the students of Mr. Albert Cross's Manchester School of Music, 'Esmeralda' was chosen, but the performers scarcely found as much to interest them as in 'La Bohème' twelve months ago; in any case 'Esmeralda' can make little appeal to present-day music-lovers, either performers or audience.

With Lady Hallé's death another link with Manchester's musical past is gone. Dr. Richter always led her on to the platform whenever she played here, and the orchestra rose to its feet quite spontaneously. Her last appearance here was on December 9, 1909, and she played the Mendelssohn Concerto (which, in Manchester minds, was associated with her name and Sarasate, much as the Beethoven with Joachim, and Tchaikovsky and Bach with Brodsky) with such vitality of style, rhythymical grace, and a certain classic purity of conception that even now memory calls up the performance quite sharply.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE AND DISTRICT.

It cannot be claimed that Bach's choral music has had adequate attention in this district. Only four choral societies have drunk at this never-failing stream of life, and only one or two church choirs have sipped thereat, but the majority of vocal organizations have timidly held aloof. Three Bach performances in one week, therefore, form an event worthy to be chronicled. The Choral Union reached one of its high-water marks three years ago with its first performance of the Mass in B minor, and repeated the work on March 22. Dr. Coward having then departed on his world-tour, another conductor was necessary, and Sir Hubert Parry was invited. The result of the preparatory work of the master of choral effect and brilliancy, and of the final control of such an eminent and profound Bach scholar, was an interpretation which, if not characterized by subtlety and highly-polished finish, was dignified, impressive and reverent. That veritable song of angels about the Throne, the Sanctus, was sung with great majesty, and the Crucifixus, while subdued and restrained, was eloquently beautiful. Madame Dewhurst sang with true artistic feeling and beauty of voice the 'Qui sedes' and the 'Agnus Dei,' and the other soloists were Miss Gladys Honey, Mr. H. Brearley, and Mr. M. Borwell. On the Sunday night following, the choir of the Elswick Road Wesleyan Church sang with care and evident appreciation, 'God's time is the best,' only the second instance that the writer can remember of a cantata being given in a Newcastle church. Mr. G. Dodds conducted his excellent choir, and his brother, Mr. H. Y. Dodds, played the organ part with skill and taste. On Wednesday, March 29, the Postal Choral Society, fast becoming noted for work out of ordinary channels, gave a fine performance of the church-cantata, 'My spirit was in heaviness,' with strings and organ. The programme also included Reger's 'Palm Sunday morning' and Anderton's 'Flower-de-luce,' two works sufficient to tax the energy and skill of any ambitious choir. Mr. E. L. Bainton conducted.

The following night, Elgar's 'Caractacus' received an excellent performance by the Jarrow Philharmonic Society, under the baton of Mr. G. Dodds. The same evening, a new society at Blyth gave 'The death of Minnehaha' at their first concert.

Mr. M. Fairs produced Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' with the South Shields Choral Society, and on April 5 conducted Brahms's German 'Requiem' at Tynemouth. The following night, a neighbouring society at Whitley Bay gave Handel's 'Israel in Egypt.' All these choral performances had orchestras more or less complete.

The Northumberland Orchestral Society (Mr. C. Horsley) gave Dvorák's first Symphony on Tuesday, April 4.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

The Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society concluded their season with a performance of Bach's B minor Mass on March 23. The colossal difficulties of the work were bravely faced by the choir, who, despite occasional defects, gave a noteworthy interpretation of the music. The 'Resurrexit,' 'Crucifixus,' and 'Et incarnatus' were magnificently performed. The solos were ably and feelingly sung by Madame Gleeson-White, Miss Edith Clegg, Mr. Alfred Headey, and Mr. Frederic Austin. Praise must also be given to the playing of the horn soloist in the accompaniment to Mr. Austin's singing of the 'Quoniam tu.' This was the first performance of the work in Nottingham, and Mr. Allen Gill is to be congratulated on his achievement.

The students of the Nottingham University College gave their annual concert on March 30, when the chief items were Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer' and Bendall's 'Lady of Shalott,' which were performed with the usual freshness of tone-quality, and precision and neatness of execution. Professor Henderson conducted, and the soloists were Miss Florence Mellors, Mr. A. Finch, and Mr. G. F. Squires.

A pianoforte recital given on March 31 by Mr. Edward Gill proved of great interest.

A performance on March 28 of Handel's 'Acis' and Haydn's 'Seasons,' by the High Pavement (Nottingham) Choral Society, is worthy of notice.

On April 6, Mr. William Woolley's Choral Society continued their excellent work with a performance of unaccompanied part-songs and madrigals, including Morley's 'Arise, awake,' Wilbye's 'Sweet honey-sucking bees,' Mendelssohn's motet 'Judge me, O God,' Coleridge-Taylor's eight-part choral rhapsody 'Sea-drift,' Elgar's 'Weary wind of the West,' Brahms's 'O lovely May,' Stanford's 'The fairies,' and Mr. Woolley's 'When lengthening shades.'

It is worthy of note that Stainer's 'Crucifixion' will be given at not less than six places of worship in this city, and reports of six other performances come to hand from the district.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

The choral societies of Doncaster and Rotherham, being neighbours and each having for its conductor Mr. Thomas Brameld, they find it expedient and profitable to join forces once a year in the performance of some work which is available only under such conditions. The plan works very well, yielding material financial advantages and some excellent artistic results. Two performances of 'The Dream of Gerontius,' one in each town, have just been given under this arrangement. The joint choral singing was notable for its directness and accuracy rather than for any high degree of finish. There was throughout a vivifying atmosphere of enthusiasm; the work of rehearsal had evidently been painstaking. There was at each performance a competent orchestra. The soloists were Madame Amy Dewhurst, Mr. Henry Brearley, and Mr. Francis Harford.

For the Spring Concert of the Sheffield Amateur Musical Society, given on the last day of March, Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' was chosen as the principal choral work. Strange to say, the popular cantata had never previously been performed by a Society now nearing its hundredth concert. The performance was clean and expressive, culminating imposingly in the popular Epilogue. Stanford's effective 'Last Post' showed the choir to exceptional advantage. A number of orchestral pieces, including Grieg's 'Lyrische Suite,' were evidently greatly enjoyed. Mr. J. A. Rodgers conducted, Mr. J. W. Phillips was organist, and the soloists were Miss Maude Phillips, Miss Agnes Griffith, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. Wilfrid Douthitt.

Some interesting orchestral concerts have been given during April. Mr. Frederick Dawson, the well-known pianist, directed the Amateur Instrumental Society in Beethoven's Symphony No. 2, Liszt's 'Les préludes,' Wagner's 'Huldigungsmarsch,' and other works. Under his tuition the Society has advanced in technique and ensemble. Bach's 'Brandenburg' concerto No. 5 was also admirably played. The soloists were Miss Alice Walker (pianoforte), Mr. A. B. Cawood (violin), and Mr. G. A. Brooke (flute).

The Sheffield Philharmonic Orchestra is a body of amateurs having two sections. The senior branch gave a concert in the Albert Hall on April 7, and introduced to Sheffield Godard's 'Gothique' symphony. The work, though well played, was uninteresting, and hardly worthy of revival. The members also played the prelude to 'Tristan,' Elgar's 'In the South' overture, and other works. On the following evening the junior section gave a well-prepared concert. The keen young musicians played brightly in Haydn's 'Farewell' Symphony and German's 'Welsh' Rhapsody, though the latter work was somewhat beyond their powers. Mr. J. H. Parkes directed both concerts.

The Heeley Wesley Choral Society gave evidence of a revival of enthusiasm and merit in a performance of Bridge's 'Flag of England,' under Mr. M. J. Shipman; and another district body, the Norton Lees Choral Society, sang intelligently in Gade's 'The Crusaders,' under the conducting of Mr. A. Bagshaw. Successful concerts, giving evidence of zeal and progress, have also been given by the Clarion Vocal Union (conductor Mr. G. Norman), and the Male Glee and Madrigal Society (Mr. W. H. Robinson). At the last Chamber Concert, the Brodsky Quartet played very beautifully.

YORKSHIRE.

LEEDS.

'Music in Yorkshire' has during the past month concentrated itself in the production of Wagner's 'Ring of the Nibelung,' at Leeds, which is dealt with in another column.

On March 23, the Leeds Trio ended their season with a programme including Borodin's String quartet in D and a manuscript Quartet by Samazeuilh, which was heard for the first time in this country, and proved to be a highly picturesque composition. The concluding concert of the Rasch Quartet, on April 4, included a repetition of Sinding's very brilliant Pianoforte quintet, with Mr. Noel Bell as pianist, and Schumann's String quartet in A; and on the following evening the last of the Leeds Bohemian Concerts introduced Hugo Wolf's 'Italienische Serenade,' together with quartets by Mozart and Dvorák. At the Leeds Municipal Concert, on March 25, Mr. Julian Clifford played in brilliant style Saint-Saëns's G minor Pianoforte concerto, and Mr. J. W. Nicholl conducted his pleasing 'Bavarian Eclogue,' which has already been heard at these concerts. The programme was to have included Goldmark's 'Rustic Wedding' symphony, but it was found necessary to make the concert more generally attractive, and to this end some Wagner pieces were substituted. In spite of the artistic zeal and well-directed efforts of Mr. Fricker and his capable orchestra, the season has, at the low prices demanded, resulted in a small loss, which threatens to be a serious one if the Corporation persist in the charge of £100 they propose to levy for the use of the Town Hall at the ten concerts.

On April 4, the Leeds Symphony Society, under Mr. A. E. Grimshaw, played a 'Meistersinger' selection and some of German's 'Romeo and Juliet' music, and Miss D. Broughton was the soloist in a creditable performance of Wieniawski's D minor Violin concerto. On April 6, a new organ, by Messrs. Harrison, of Durham, was opened in St. Chad's Church, recitals being given by the organist, Mr. Percy Richardson, and Mr. T. Tertius Noble, of York Minster. It is an instrument of good quality, and has been given in memory of the late vicar, Mr. W. H. Stables, a musician of considerable ability, by his widow and children: a munificent and most appropriate gift. The annual performance of the 'St. Matthew' Passion at the Parish Church took place on the Monday in Holy Week (April 10), when, under Dr. Bairstow's direction, a finished and reverent interpretation was given.

OTHER TOWNS.

At Middlesbrough, on April 5, a most interesting revival took place of Bach's 'St. John' Passion, which has not been heard in Yorkshire—save for a necessarily incomplete church performance or two—for many years. The Middlesbrough Musical Union, a Society which, under Mr. Kilburn's direction, has always been distinguished by its artistic enterprise, was responsible for the production, which was worthy of the work. Mr. Frank Mullings declaimed the Narrator's recitative with unflinching taste, and Mr. Herbert Parker sang with reverent expression the Saviour's words, while Miss Gladys Honey, Miss Edith Clegg, and Mr. Herbert Brown sang the rest of the difficult and often ungrateful solo music most artistically. On March 28, Dr. Richter made his last appearance in Yorkshire at the Huddersfield Subscription Concert, when he conducted the Hallé Orchestra in Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic Symphony' and three familiar overtures, while Mr. Johan Rasch was the soloist in Max Bruch's G minor Violin concerto. The York Symphony Orchestra, on March 20, gave a concert which was distinguished by the appearance of Miss Fanny Davies, who played Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto with charming sympathy and breadth of style. Mr. T. Tertius Noble conducted. On April 4, the York Musical Society, also under Mr. Noble, gave Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater,' the most noteworthy feature of a generally adequate performance being the fact that it was sung in the English version, Mr. Crowe's adaptation of the text being employed. The principals were Miss Bywater, Miss Coppin, Mr. Heather, and Mr. Campbell McInnes. Mr. Noble's 'Solemn Prelude' and the 'Unfinished' Symphony were included in the programme. The same work was given on the same day, together with Sterndale Bennett's 'The woman of Samaria,' by the Hull Vocal Society, under Dr. G. H. Smith, and with Miss Gladys Honey, Miss Mandeville, and Messrs. Brearley and Herbert Brown as soloists. It was also chosen for a special service in Ripon Cathedral on April 12, when, under Mr. Moody's direction, it received a sympathetic interpretation. The Keighley Musical Union, under Mr. R. Moore, gave, on March 21, Beethoven's 'Mount of Olives' and Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' with Miss Newport, Miss Day, Mr. Brearley, and Mr. W. Moore as principals. On March 24, the Harrogate Choral Society, under Mr. C. L. Naylor, gave Mr. Hubert Bath's 'Wedding of Shon Maclean,' and on the same evening this popular cantata was chosen for performance by the Ilkley Vocal Society, together with Elgar's 'King Olaf,' under Mr. Akeroyd's conductorship. On the former occasion Madame Poole, Mr. Thorogood, and Mr. O'Connor were the principals: at Ilkley, the solos were taken by Miss Rich, Mr. Mullings, and Mr. Hoyle.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

ABERDEEN.—At a concert given by the Aberdeen Male-voice Choir on March 25, the programme included unaccompanied part-songs by Brahms, Mendelssohn, Granville Bantock, MacDowell, Weingartner, and others, Grieg's 'Landerkenning,' and Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet.' The solos in the last-named were sung by Mr. John Cooper, a member of the choir. Miss Helen Jenkins also contributed vocal solos, and Mr. A. Collingwood conducted. There was a crowded and enthusiastic audience.

BISHOP AUCKLAND.—The enterprise of the Musical Society conducted by Mr. N. Kilburn secured a remarkable programme for their concert on March 21. The central feature was the performance, with M. Louis Pesckai as soloist, of Elgar's Violin concerto. The violinist encountered the technical difficulties of the work with precision, and showed complete understanding of the subtly expressive music. The Leeds Symphony Orchestra played admirably in spite of the impossibility of full rehearsal, and contributed Tchaikovsky's 'Symphonie Pathétique' to the programme. The choir of the Society also took part.

BLACKBURN.—A deeply expressive and technically excellent performance of Elgar's 'The Dream of Gerontius' was given by the St. Cecilia and Vocal Union on March 31. Under the direction of Dr. Bairstow the choir gave an interpretation that was one of their best achievements. The solo parts were taken by Miss Dilys Jones, Mr. Gervase Elwes and Mr. W. Hayle.

BRIGHTON.—Dr. W. H. Speer's 'The lay of St. Cuthbert' and Verdi's 'Requiem' formed a vividly contrasted programme for the concert given by the Festival Chorus and Municipal Orchestra, under Mr. Joseph Sainton's direction, on April 5. The humorous work was sung with all possible point, and the performance of the 'Requiem' equalled that given by the same choir in London on January 24. The soloists were Miss Edith Kirkwood, Miss Ethel Harman, Mr. Roland Jackson and Mr. George Baker.

CARDIFF.—Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion was performed, for the first time in Wales, by the Harmonic Society, at the Park Hall, on March 29. The choir of 260 and orchestra of 75 (led by Mr. Arthur Angle) gave an admirable interpretation of the work, under the direction of Mr. Roderick Williams, and certain authorities pronounced the occasion to be the best choral achievement heard in the Principality. The principal soloists were Madame Laura Evans-Williams, Miss Winifred Lewis, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Ivor Foster. Mr. Harry Evans assisted at the organ.

COWES.—The Northwood Choral Society, with the assistance of Mr. Frederick Rutland's Amateur Orchestra, and under the conductorship of Mr. Rutland, gave a performance of Gounod's 'Redemption' at Cowes, on Wednesday, April 5. The soloists were Mrs. G. W. Fellows, Miss Hilda Matthews, Miss Eveline Phillips, Mr. Hubert Eisdell, and Mr. H. T. Kemp.

DUNFERMLINE.—'A Midsummer night's Dream' with Mendelssohn's music was performed by the Carnegie Dunfermline Trust Dramatic Class on March 30, March 31, and April 1. The orchestra of the School of Music, under the direction of Mr. David Stephen, supplied accompaniments, and a choir of school children trained by Mr. John Kerr took part.

DURBAN (NATAL).—A concert was given on March 2, by pupils of the Academy of Music, Cuthbert's Buildings, and others, under the management of Mr. W. Phillips Lowry. A number of vocal and instrumental solos were given, and a choir and orchestra also took part under Mr. Lowry's direction.

FERNDALE.—The Salem Newydd Choral Society gave a creditable performance of Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' before a large audience at the Workmen's Hall on March 25. Mr. Tim Davies (postmaster) conducted, and the solo parts were sung by Miss Blodwen Hopkins, Miss Clandia Hopkins, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs and Mr. Norman Allin.

GRIMSBY.—An interesting and ambitious programme, consisting of Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Endymion's dream' was chosen by the Philharmonic Society for their concert on March 28. Highly expressive and efficient performances as usual were given under the direction of Mr. Walter Porter. The assistance of a large orchestra added to the artistic completeness of the occasion. The solo parts were taken by Miss Eva Rich and Mr. Alexander Webster.

GUILDFORD.—Mr. Archibald Hollier is to be congratulated on an excellent performance of 'Elijah,' given on April 6. The singing of the choir was remarkably good. The soloists were Miss Elaine Birch, Miss E. Comerford-Finch, Mr. Noel C. Swindell, and Mr. George Baker.

HANLEY.—A return visit was recently paid by the London Symphony Orchestra to the Hanley Glee and Madrigal Society, and the two organizations joined forces to give, under the direction of Mr. John James, a repetition of the performance of Berlioz's 'Faust' with which they had earned profuse admiration a short time previously in London under Dr. Richter. The interpretation of the work was again admirable in every respect. The soloists were Miss Emily Breare, Miss M. Latham, Mr. Henry Brearley, Mr. Robert Burnett, and Mr. John Bradbury.

HUNTINGDON.—An excellent performance of Elgar's 'Caractacus' was given on March 22 by the Huntingdon and Godmanchester Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Frank Clark. The choir and orchestra of 130 members joined with the soloists, Miss Anna Shergold, Mr. Jackson Potter, Mr. W. H. Bullock, and Mr. Hubert Eisdell, giving a highly expressive and dramatic interpretation.

HYTHE.—The twenty-second concert of the Hythe Choral Society, bringing the eighth season to a conclusion, took place on March 30, when 'The Messiah' was performed. The orchestra was chiefly derived from the band of the 2nd Battalion Oxfordshire Light Infantry. The principals were Miss Betty Hyde, Miss Marion Battisill, Mr. E. C. Turner, and Mr. Albert Brown. Dr. A. T. Froggatt conducted.

JOHANNESBURG.—Weber's 'Preciosa' Overture, Rubinstein's 'Trot de Cavalerie' march, and Ambroise Thomas's 'Le Caid' Overture were played by the Amateur Orchestral Society at the concert of the Musical Society on March 8. The fifty instrumentalists responded well to the direction of Mr. F. W. Peters. Songs were given by Madame Maly von Trutzschler and Mr. Alfred Bertwhistle.

LINCOLN.—An admirable performance of 'Elijah' was given on March 29 by the Lincoln Musical Society, under the skilful direction of Dr. G. J. Bennett. Band and choir numbered 250 performers. The chief soloists were Miss Esta d'Arco, Miss Mildred Jones, Mr. J. B. Render, and Mr. Herbert Brown. Mr. E. O'Brien was leader of an efficient orchestra.

LLWYNHENDY.—Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' and Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' were performed by the Soar Choral Society at their sixth annual oratorio concert. The solo parts were taken by Miss Marie Houghton, Mr. James Hay, and other artists. Mr. Whitaker's orchestra, Swansea, and Mr. Luther Owen at the organ supplied accompaniments. Mr. D. Vernon Davies made his first appearance as conductor of the Society.

MADELEY (SHROPSHIRE).—A highly creditable performance of 'The Messiah' was given by the Choral Society in the Market Hall, on April 4. Her Grace The Duchess of Sutherland honoured the Society with her presence. The principals were Madame Aston, Miss Olive Pank, Mr. J. Hackett, and Mr. J. Coleman. A small band, comprising leading instrumentalists of the Birmingham orchestras, supplied the accompaniments. The concert was as usual, conducted by Mr. Smart, to whom an ivory and silver-mounted baton was presented.

NEWPORT (ISLE OF WIGHT).—An excellent performance of Dr. Walford Davies's 'Everyman' was given by the Philharmonic Society on April 6, under the direction of the talented conductor, Mr. Harry Cushing. The accompaniments were ably played by the Newport Amateur Orchestral Society. The soloists were Madame Anna Shergold, Miss Lydia John, Mr. James Horncastle (of Dr. Davies's Temple Church Choir), and Mr. Joseph Farrington.

NEWPORT (MON).—For their concert on March 30 the Choral Society chose Gounod's 'Gallia' and Leonli's 'The Gate of Life,' and in performing these works did justice to their varied requirements. The tone was excellent and the singing expressive. Mr. Arthur E. Sims conducted, and the solo parts were taken by Miss Edith Evans, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Ivor Foster.

NORWICH.—A performance of Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' was given in the Cathedral by the combined forces of the Norwich Choral Society and the Norwich Philharmonic Society, under the conductorship of Dr. Bates, on Thursday, April 6. The chief soloists were Miss Edith Evans, Mrs. George Swinton, Mr. A. E. Benson and Mr. Vincent Jones. The engagement of the Norwich Festival Chorus to take part in the opening performances of the London Musical Festival on May 22, under the direction of Sir Henry Wood, has given great satisfaction locally.

PEEBLES.—Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet,' with Mr. R. Black as soloist, were the chief feature in the programme of the concert given by the Peebles Gleemen on March 22. Mr. H. Whalley conducted, and secured highly creditable results.

PETERBOROUGH.—The Choral Union surpassed all their previous achievements on April 4 with a performance of Elgar's 'The Dream of Gerontius,' which had not previously been heard in the district. The choral difficulties were successfully overcome, and adequate expressive feeling was infused into the interpretation. The conductor was Mr. A. E. Armstrong, and the soloists were Miss Carmen Hill, Mr. Gervase Elwes and Mr. Frederick Ranalow.

PORTSMOUTH.—A Brahms concert was given by the Philharmonic Society in the Town Hall on March 30, under the direction of Mr. H. A. Barry. The chief feature, a performance of the 'Requiem,' was one of great excellence, to which all sections of the performing body contributed. The soloists were Miss Doris Simpson and Mr. William Higley. The choir also sang the 'Song of Destiny,' and the orchestra was heard independently in the 'Tragic' Overture.—Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion was sung at the Parish Church on April 2, guided by Mr. R. H. Turner at the organ. The chief tenor soloist was Mr. W. Guard, and the part of the Saviour was sung by Mr. C. Wassell.

READING.—The Free Church Choral Society gave the concluding concert of their ninth season on March 22, in the Town Hall, when Brahms's 'Requiem,' Rheinberger's Organ concerto in G minor, and Bach's 'Sleepers, wake!' were presented. The chorus-singing was noticeable for the blending and perfect intonation of the voices; and the many excellent points made in the Requiem showed that the choir was in close sympathy with the work. The soloists were Miss Alice Hare and Mr. Francis Harford. In the Bach cantata, Mr. Alfred Glead sang the small part allotted to the tenor effectively. Mr. F. G. Goodenough was the organist, and Mr. A. W. Moss the conductor.

REIGATE.—The revised version of Mackenzie's picturesque dramatic cantata 'The Rose of Sharon' was performed to excellent effect by the Choral Society on March 30, under the direction of Mr. Harold Macpherson. The soloists, Miss Gertrude Inglis, Miss Grace Hayward, Mr. Hubert Eisdell and Mr. Dan Richards, joined with the choir and orchestra to give a highly expressive interpretation of the work, which was well received.

RYDE.—The concluding popular concert of the season was given on Monday, April 3, by the Royal Marine Artillery Band, under Mr. B. S. Green, the soloist being Miss Mabel Coran.—On April 6, the Philharmonic Society gave an admirable performance of 'Elijah,' under Mr. C. B. Hair, the soloists being Miss Dorothy Cook-Smith, Miss Maud Wright, Mr. Herbert Eisdell, and Mr. James Coleman.

SOUTHPORT.—Dr. Brewer's interesting cantata 'Summer sports' occupied the chief attention of Mr. J. C. Clarke's efficient Choral Society at their concert on March 28. The programme, which was excellently carried out, also included part-songs. Mr. Arthur Pugh and Miss Amalfi were the solo vocalists of the occasion.

SUNDERLAND.—Elgar's Violin concerto was played by M. Louis Peckski at a concert of the Sunderland Philharmonic Society on March 23, with accompaniment supplied by the Leeds Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. N. Kilburn. The same soloist, conductor, and orchestra had given a performance of the Concerto at Bishop Auckland two days previously, and the second occasion reproduced the artistic triumphs of the first. Haydn's 'The Seasons,' Part I., and Goetz's 'Nenia' were excellently sung by the choir.

WIGAN.—A good performance of Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius' was given by the Wigan and District Philharmonic Society in the Pavilion on April 5. The choir, numbering over 200, had the assistance of the Wigan Harmonic Male-voice Choir, and the feeling generally expressed was that this body of singers had never before sung with such artistic insight, and with so much expression and efficiency. The principals were Miss Jean Fyans, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Joseph Lycett. The semi-chorus consisted of members of the Warrington Musical Society. The Manchester Orchestra assisted. Mr. Edgar C. Robinson, the conductor of both choirs, is to be congratulated upon the success of the concert.

WINDSOR.—The Windsor and Eton Choral Society, which is flourishing after an existence of seventy years, performed Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' in the Memorial Hall, Eton College, on March 20, under the direction of the Rev. Bernard Everett, and gave an admirable interpretation in which choir and orchestra shared the credit with the chief soloists, Madame Agnes Nicholls, Miss Florence Taylor, Mr. Wilfred Kearton, and Mr. George Parker.

WORTHING.—The annual concert of the Choral Society took place on Wednesday, March 22, when Mendelssohn's 'Athalie' and Stanford's 'The Revenge' were performed. The choir and orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. F. D. Carnell, gave dramatic interpretations of both works.

Foreign Notes.

BERLIN.

Dvorák's beautiful but rarely-heard fourth Symphony in G major, Op. 88, was heard at the seventh concert of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde. On the same occasion Max von Oberleithner's second Symphony in E flat major was played for the first time.—The young composer Erich Wolfgang Korngold made his first appearance in Berlin at the third concert of the Rosé Quartet, when he played the pianoforte part of his Trio, Op. 1.—Three new works, namely, Ewald Strässer's Symphony in G major, a Symphony in B minor by Julius Weisman, and Henryk Melcer's Pianoforte concerto, were introduced at an orchestral concert given by the conductor, Dr. Karl Mennicke.—On March 18, Leoncavallo's opera 'Maia' was given at the Royal Opera House for the first time in Germany. The composer, who was present, was accorded a flattering ovation, but the general opinion about the work itself is anything but favourable.—Georg Schumann's new overture, 'Lebensfreude,' Op. 54, was successfully produced at the tenth Philharmonic Concert (conductor, Professor Arthur Nikisch).—The programme of the second concert of the Schwedische Musikgesellschaft (a Society formed for the performance of Swedish music in Berlin) contained Svante Sjöberg's 'Gustav Wasa' overture, Op. 5, a Pianoforte concerto by Adolf Wiklund, a tone-poem, 'Eine Sage aus den Schären,' and the second Symphony in D major, Op. 11, by Hugo Alfvén.—Paul Juon's new 'Kammersymphony' (for string orchestra, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and pianoforte) was given with great success at one of the concerts of the Blüthner Orchestra.—At the eighth concert of the Königliche Kapelle (conductor, Dr. Richard Strauss), Ernst Boehe's tone-poem 'Die Klage der Nausikaa' was played for the first time, arousing considerable interest.—Under the conductorship of Herr Ignaz Waghalter, Paderewski's Symphony was also given for the first time in Berlin.—At the tenth Symphonischer Musikabend of the Berliner Konzertverein, Herr Josef Stransky introduced Herr Richard Mandl's 'Griseldis' Symphony.

BERNE.

Some interesting choral compositions, including Arnold Mendelssohn's 'Pandora,' Othmar Schoeck's 'Postillon,' and Max Reger's eight-part male chorus, 'An das Meer,' have been performed recently with great success.

BORDEAUX.

Reynaldo Hahn's 'Carmélite' (to the text of Catulle Méndès) and Gabriel Dupont's opera 'La Glu,' have both lately been performed for the first time at the Grand Théâtre.

BREMEN.

Richard Strauss's 'Der Rosenkavalier' has been given at the Municipal Theatre with great success.—A concert devoted to pianoforte compositions by Madame Pauline Erdmannsdörfer-Fichtner aroused considerable interest.—Two fine choruses by Siegmund von Hausegger, viz., 'Schmied Schmerz' and 'Neuwein lied' were sung for the first time at the third concert of the Lehrergesangverein (conductor, Herr Ernst Wendel).

BUDA-PEST.

A new opera, 'A bolond' (The jester), composed by Bela Szabados to the libretto of Eugen Rakosi, has been produced with success at the Royal Opera.

CASSEL.

On March 15, Reinhold Hermann's three-act opera 'Sundari' was produced at the Court Theatre.

DORTMUND.

Felix Woysch's opera, 'Der Weiberkrieg,' has been given for the first time at the Municipal Theatre. The same composer's 'Passionsoratorium' formed the programme of the third Musikvereinsconcert (conductor, Professor Janssen).—At the nineteenth Symphony concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra, Professor Fr. Gernsheim conducted his Overture 'Zu einem Drama' and his Violin concerto (soloist M. Henri Marteau). Another interesting number was Vivaldi's Concerto for three violins and string orchestra.

DRESDEN.

On April 1, the operetta 'Meine Tante, deine Tante,' by Madame Amelie Nikisch, was produced at the Residenztheater with great success for the composer and librettist.

DÜSSELDORF.

Under the conductorship of Professor Karl Panzner, Glazounoff's sixth Symphony, Liszt's 'Dante' Symphony, and several works by Sibelius, including the Romance for string orchestra, Op. 42, have been played for the first time.

ESSEN.

Under the direction of Herr Obsner, Pergolesi's opera, 'La serva padrona,' has been revived at the Stadttheater with considerable success.

HAMBURG.

At the Opera, 'Rahab,' a one-act opera, by Clemens von Frankenstein, has been produced under the direction of Herr Gustav Brecher. The title-part was created by Miss Edyth Walker.—At an orchestral concert conducted by Herr Felix Mottl, the three Böcklin-Phantasien 'Im Spiele der Wellen,' 'Die Toteninsel,' and 'Der Eremit,' by Felix Woysch, were heard for the first time with much interest.—At the eighth Philharmonic concert, Herr Siegmund von Hausegger introduced Bruneau's prelude to 'Messidor,' and at the tenth concert Ernst Boehe's 'Tragic Overture' was given for the first time.

KARLSRUHE.

Under the baton of Herr Leopold Reichwein, Mahler's fifth Symphony was recently performed for the first time.—At the Opera, Richard Strauss's 'Der Rosenkavalier' was performed with great success.

LEIPZIG.

In the absence of Professor Arthur Nikisch, the twentieth Gewandhausconcert was conducted by Herr Weingartner, who introduced his latest Symphony (No. 3, in E major).—The sixth and last Chamber Music concert at the small hall of the Gewandhaus proved of great interest. Hugo Wolf's String quartet in D minor, and Hans Fitzen's Pianoforte trio in F major (with Herr Reger at the pianoforte) were both played for the first time in Leipzig, and Reger's new Sextet for strings, Op. 118, was produced, evoking great enthusiasm.—Haydn's 'Harmoniemesse' was given at the second Riedelvereinsconcert (conductor, Dr. Georg Göhler).—At the eleventh Philharmonic concert, Mr. Arthur Shattuck played Rachmaninoff's Pianoforte concerto in F sharp minor for the first time.—The violinist Herr Gustav Havemann (who has been appointed professor of the Conservatoire in succession to the late Arno Hilff), gave an orchestral concert and played Felix Woysch's 'Skaldische Rhapsodie' and Max Reger's 'Chaconne' for violin solo, Op. 117.—Rousseau's 'Le devin du village' was given for the first time at the Neues Theater, preceding the first performance in Leipzig of Korngold's 'Pantomime ballet' 'Der Schneemann.'

MAGDEBURG.

Friedrich Kiel's beautiful and rarely-heard second 'Requiem' was recently revived at a concert of the Reblingsche Kirchengesangverein (conductor, Professor Kauffmann).

MEININGEN.

Dr. Max Reger has been appointed 'Generalmusik-director' of the Meiningen Hofkapelle. He will take up his new duties on December 1.

MILAN.

The first performances in Italy of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion were given here on April 22 and 23.

MONTE CARLO.

Saint-Saëns's new opera 'Dejanire' (libretto by Louis Gallet) has been produced at the Opera House with great success. The composer was present. The work is said to rank with 'Samson and Delilah.'

MOSCOW.

At the last Kussewitzky concert of the season, March 15, Alexandre Scriabine's newest work, the tone-poem 'Prometheus,' was produced with great success.

NEW YORK.

On March 29, Paul Dukas's 'Ariane et Barbe bleu' was given for the first time at the Metropolitan Opera House. Miss Geraldine Farrar sang the part of Ariane, and Signor Toscanini conducted.

NICE.

On March 21, the first performance in France (and in French) of Eugen d'Albert's opera 'Tiefeland' took place, with great success, at the Opéra. A few days later, Chabrier's 'Gwendoline' was also given for the first time.

PARIS.

On March 29, a four-act opera, 'Elsen,' composed by Adalbert Mercier to the libretto of Jean Ferval, was produced at the Théâtre-Lyrique de la Gaité.—At the fifth concert of French Chamber music organized by M. Jaques Durand, M. Claude Debussy played a number of his new Pianoforte preludes, arousing great enthusiasm. Félicien David's 'Lalla Rookh' has lately been revived at the Trianon-Lyrique. At the Colonne concert on April 2, some interesting fragments of a ballet, 'Daphnis et Chloe,' composed by M. Maurice Ravel for the famous Russian dancers, and to be produced by them in the Spring, were played for the first time.

SONDERSHAUSEN.

A four-act comic opera, 'Frauenlied,' by the Danish composer Emil Robert Hansen, solo-violoncellist at the Leipsic Gewandhaus Orchestra, has been successfully produced at the Court Theatre.

STUTTGART.

Under the baton of Professor Ernst H. Seyffardt, Sgambati's 'Messa da Requiem' was given for the first time at the second subscription concert of the Singverein.—At the Royal Opera, the first performance of Humperdinck's newest opera, 'Die Königskinder,' proved a great success.

VIENNA.

The Männerchorgesangverein recently produced Anton Bruckner's 'Abendzauber' written for male (humming) chorus, three (jödelling) female solo voices, baritone solo and four horns.—At the Volksoper, Vittorio Gnecci's opera 'Cassandra' proved very interesting when recently given for the first time. Though composed before Strauss's 'Elektra' appeared, it shows at times an extraordinary likeness to many themes of that work.

A concert-version of Mr. Raymond Roze's opera 'Joan of Arc' will be performed at Queen's Hall on May 24 in the afternoon. The Edward Mason and Westminster Cathedral Choirs will take part.

Miscellaneous.

The second festival service of the London College for Chorists will be held at Holy Trinity Church, Marylebone on Tuesday, May 23, at 8 o'clock. The music will include Preces and Responses (Dr. Brewer), Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (Dr. Hugh Blair), 'O praise the Lord' (Mendelssohn), 'Praise to the Holiest' ('Gerontius') (Elgar), and 'Let the bright Seraphim' (Handel). Dr. Hugh Blair will preside at the organ, and Mr. James Bates will conduct.

A Welsh Coronation hymn and anthem have been issued by Messrs. Novello & Co. The words of the hymn are by the Rev. W. Morgan, Rural Dean of Montgomeryshire, and the music by Mr. Thomas Edwards, of Chester. The anthem, 'The King shall rejoice,' by Sir John Goss, suitably wedded to the Welsh words, contains a solo for treble or tenor, and a chorus, 'Be Thou exalted, Lord, in Thine own strength,' followed by the National Anthem.

The promised performance on May 4, under the direction of Dr. Borland, of Elgar's 'The Apostles,' by the combined forces of the Bermondsey Settlement Choral and Orchestral Union (conducted by Dr. Borland) and the Hither Green Choral and Orchestral Society (conducted by Mr. E. Stanley Roper and not, as stated in our last issue, by Dr. Borland) has been abandoned for the present, and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' will be performed instead.

The United Choir Festival of the London Wesleyan Methodist Choir Union took place at Wesley's Chapel, City Road, on March 27. A service of music chosen from Wesley's works, and including the anthems 'The Lord hath been mindful' and 'To my request and earnest cry,' was sung under the direction of Mr. Alfred Furse, with the assistance of Mr. C. F. Warner at the organ.

The programme of the British Music Trades' Convention, to be held under the auspices of the Pianoforte Manufacturers' Association and Music Trades' Association, at Harrogate, on May 11, 12 and 13, has been issued. The numerous functions arranged include receptions, meetings for technical discussion, and a concert at the Kursaal under Mr. Julian Clifford's direction.

Mr. Thomas Quinlan has arranged an Autumn provincial season of opera in English, to be given at Liverpool, Newcastle, Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, Glasgow and Edinburgh. The repertory will include Puccini's 'The girl of the golden West.' Mr. Cuthbert Hawley and Signor Voghera will be the conductors.

On March 25, Mr. Walter Porter, who for twenty-five years has conducted the Hull Harmonic Society, was presented with a gold watch and chain by the Mayor on behalf of the Society. Speeches were made by Mr. Camp (secretary), Mr. Nichol (organist), and by Mr. Porter in reply.

The Tonic Sol-fa College will hold its annual meeting at the Guildhall, on May 20, under the presidency of the Lord Mayor. The speakers will be Sir Samuel Evans and Mr. Landon Ronald.

Answers to Correspondents.

ANXIOUS.—Your experience as a student of voice-production and singing is that of a large number of aspirants. Obviously it is impossible to say off-hand whether your teachers are at fault or whether you are limited in your power of absorption. It is one of the veriest commonplaces of the day to remark that voice producers always declare that the previous method used was on the wrong tack. But it does not appear to be so well known that pupils of singing sometimes reach their saturation point very quickly. Teaching cannot squeeze more than a pint into a pint pot.

STRAD VIOLINS.—We are constantly receiving letters asking our opinion of violins labelled with the name of some celebrated old Italian maker. We have repeatedly said that a label supplies absolutely no evidence that an instrument is a genuine 'old master.' It merely means that a certain model shape has been followed. One might as well suppose that a cheap chromo reproduction of a Turner picture is the picture simply because the name of the painter is on it. That these questions continue to arrive induces the melancholy reflection that our correspondents do not read the Musical Times.

ENQUIRER.—We cannot here recommend any particular teacher of singing. Your best plan will be to seek advice at one of the principal teaching institutions. The Royal Academy and the Royal College may not care to undertake a short course, but there are many excellent professors at the Guildhall, Trinity College and the London Academy of Music who would serve your purpose.

E. D. WOOD, HORWICH.—Works for pianoforte, two violins, violoncello, double-bass, oboe and clarinet must be few and far between. If your clarinettist would consent to play a viola part so far as it can be performed on his instrument, no doubt your repertory would be enlarged. Why not get a clever musician to reduce the score of a Mozart orchestral work to the scope of your resources?

K. Y., GREAT YARMOUTH.—The half-bars in Moscheles's piece are both of the nature of prolongations of the preceding bars. They do not produce rhythmic ineffectiveness, as they lead into the announcement of a new section, and therefore are in the position often occupied by cadenzas, in which rhythmic continuity may be entirely ignored.

J. C. BURGEON.—The effect of the B natural in the seventh bar of the F sharp section of Schumann's Romance, Op. 28, No. 1, which we take to be correct, is that a return is made from C to F a little sooner than the ear leads one to expect it. The unblushing, but not unacceptable, consecutive fifths between treble and bass are a much more remarkable feature.

LYDIA PRIOR.—Prout's recommendation is not a rule. In your example, soprano and alto have no difficulty at all, as they echo the tenor and bass note for note. After all, it is only a question of the first reading-over of the piece. The change is easily memorised.

P. J. WILSON, NEW YORK.—We know of no performance of Ed. Grell's 'Missa Solemnis' given in England, but it does not follow that none has taken place.

JESSIE WHELLAMS, BRITISH COLUMBIA.—The melody you quote is that of the middle section of Chopin's 'Fantaisie-Improvisation' in C sharp minor (Op. 66), for pianoforte.

J. M. RHODES, TORONTO.—Haydn's 'Toy Symphony' is published by André, of Offenbach-am-Main. It can be obtained from Messrs. Novello.

G. F. FOWLER.—Miss C. Stainer's Dictionary of violin-makers (Novello's Primer series) gives some interesting particulars regarding Nicola Amati, brother of Andrea, and of Nicola Amati, son of Girolamo.

LYNETTE MACNISH, BRISBANE.—We see no objection to the timing 104 =

THE MUSICAL EDUCATOR.

A LIBRARY OF INSTRUCTION IN MUSIC

WRITTEN BY EXPERTS.

FIRST PAYMENT, 1s. 6d.

The aim of “The Musical Educator” is to supply in compact and interesting form a complete and systematic musical education.

We would especially draw attention to the following names of Leaders in the Musical World, and of the subjects for which they are responsible. The practical value of these sections will be apparent to all students and professors of music and singing.

MARK HAMBOURG, “The Piano and how to Play it.”

EDWIN H. LEMARE, “The Art of Organ Playing.”

MADAME MARCHESI, “The Teaching of Singing.”

JOHN DUNN, “On Playing the Violin.”

DR. F. H. COWEN, “The Art of Conducting.”

Course of Voice Training, Singing, and Solfeggio. Course on the Pianoforte. Course on the Violin. Positions illustrated by Diagrams and Photographs. Course on Harmonium, American Organ, and on the Organ. Lessons on Scientific Basis of Music. Lessons on Rudiments of Music. Course on Harmony and Counterpoint. Lessons in Canon and Fugue. Lessons in Musical Forms, Musical Analysis and Composition. Dictionary of Musical Terms. Articles on the Instruments used in the Orchestras and in Military Bands. History of Music. Biographical Dictionary of Musicians. Articles on Children's Music and Musical Drill. Articles on Choir Training and Conducting. Article on Congregational Music. Article on Musical Degrees and Education. Article on Nationality in Music.

ITS VALUE TO THE TEACHER.

In “The Musical Educator” every section is dealt with by an expert. Its value to the teacher of music is obvious, because it shows the way—at once simple and lucid—in which some of the greatest of musical professors would set about the instruction of a pupil anxious to perfect himself in his particular department, whether it be that of the piano, the violin, the harp, or any other instrument, or of any department of singing.

Add to this its all-round value as a standard work of reference on every point concerning the wide domain of music and musicians, and it will be granted that “The Musical Educator” is unique as well as complete.

TWO OPINIONS.

Sir J. FREDERICK BRIDGE.

“‘The Musical Educator’ is full of useful information plainly set forth. The musical illustrations are excellent.”

Dr. CRESER, Mus. D. Oxon, F.R.C.O., F.T.C.L.

(Examiner in Music at Trinity College), writes:—
“We have here an illuminative work of great value, not only to the student, but also to the general reader.
... It contains excellent instructions.”

QUEEN'S CORONATION SONG.

MESSRS. PATERSON & SONS have much pleasure in announcing that they have issued a Coronation Song, entitled:

"QUEEN MARY"

Specially written in honour of Her Most Gracious Majesty, and set to the celebrated melody of

"MARY"

("Kind, kind and gentle is she").

This fine combination of words and music will be sung at the forthcoming Coronation Celebrations all over the Country.

Copies of the Words, with the Melody in Sol-fa, are now ready, printed on a card, price 1d. These will be supplied to schools, etc., at the rate of 5s. per 100, and postage free.

The Music for this Song, with Pianoforte Accompaniment, is published in four keys, E flat, F (compass F to G), G, and A flat. Price 2s. net.

Also Just Published.

"MARY"

THE CELEBRATED BALLAD,

Arranged for Military Band by LIEUT. CH. GODFREY, M.V.O.

Price 1s. net. (Post-free).

This arrangement can be used as a Concert Piece; also to accompany voices.

As these important publications will be used at all local Coronation Celebrations, early application is advised.

PATERSON & SONS,

27, GEORGE STREET, EDINBURGH, AND 26, CASTLE STREET, BERNERS STREET, LONDON, W.

ADDITIONAL HYMNS WITH TUNES

HYMNS ANCIENT AND MODERN
OR ANY OTHER CHURCH HYMNAL.

Hymns only, medium 32mo, diamond type, cloth, 4d. ; paper, 3d.

For this reason the Hymns are numbered from 801, so that the numbers may not interfere with the use of any other hymn book, no other Church hymn book having as many as even seven hundred hymns. Each hymn has its own distinctive tune, and no hymn or tune in this work is found in Hymns Ancient and Modern (Old Edition), so that with the two books no duplication occurs.

THE NEW CATHEDRAL PSALTER

CONTAINING

THE PSALMS OF DAVID

TOGETHER WITH THE CANTICLES AND PROPER PSALMS

(Organist of St. Paul's).

NEW CATHEDRAL PSALTER CHANTS.

PSALTER AND CHANTS COMBINED.

The "New Cathedral Psalter," though founded on the old Cathedral Psalter, is a distinct book, and the two books cannot be used together. The old Cathedral Psalter is still in circulation in all its editions.

SEVENTH AND REVISED EDITION.

A HANDBOOK

EXAMINATIONS IN MUSIC

CONTAINING

600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY

ERNEST A. DICKS,

Fellow of the Royal College of Organists.

PREFACE TO THE SEVENTH EDITION.

Through the kindness of Dr. E. H. Turpin the seventh edition of the Handbook of Examinations in Music includes the latest type of Papers set by Trinity College of Music, London, in their scheme of Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge.

The work will also be found to have been considerably enlarged by the addition of fifty specimen questions, with answers. They have been designed for the most part after the manner of those set in the Theory Paper for the L.R.A.M. Diploma, and also that required by candidates for the Higher Practical Examinations held by Trinity College of Music, London. The author earnestly hopes that these additions will considerably enhance the value of the Handbook, and render it increasingly helpful to students.

SHORT PRELUDES

FOR THE

ORGAN

These Short Preludes are intended for use chiefly as Introductory Voluntaries to Divine Service, more especially in those churches where the time allowed for such is, of necessity, somewhat limited. They occupy in performance from about one to two minutes.

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or, briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

A Modern School for the Violin

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ AND JAMES BROWN.

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" consists of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a large number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE. IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of DAILY TECHNICAL PRACTICE. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c., with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES. IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each Book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on, and the appropriate pairs are now issued bound together in cloth (see Cloth Bindings below).

1A. TECHNICAL PRACTICE (1st Position)	2s. 6d.	1B. STUDIES ... .. (1st Position)	2s. 6d.
2A. DITTO (1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions)	2s. 6d.	2B. DITTO (1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions)	2s. 6d.

Competition Festival Record

THE MARY WAKEFIELD MEMORIAL.

The committee has met several times to examine designs for a proposed medallion which is to be offered to festivals as a prize. They have not yet decided upon which design to adopt, and therefore it will not be possible to offer medallions for this season's competitions. The designs submitted will be on view at the Association of Competitive Festivals' Conference, to be held on Wednesday, May 31, as announced in our last issue.

MORECAMBE FESTIVAL.

May 16 to 20.

We are informed that the number of competitors entered for the five days is over 5,000. We gave the chief details of the programme in our last issue.

For the challenge shield class nine choirs have entered—Barrow Madrigal, Haverigg, Tynedale, Mr. Aldous' Choir (Lancaster), Carlisle Madrigal, Sale, Nottingham, Morecambe, and Blackpool. For the male-voice choir competition (tenor lead), Manchester Orpheus, Ulster, Whitehaven, Habergham, Kendal, Millom, Todmorden, and Colne U.M.C. will compete, and in the same competition (alto lead), Morley, Boots Choral, Heaton Parish, Barnoldswick, Vickerstown, Alfreton, Holme, Mexborough, Carlisle, Flimby, and Belfast have entered. For the orchestra competition (string), Nelson Congregational and Brackenburgh, Penrith, have entered.

The principal adjudicators will be Sir Edward Elgar, Dr. McNaught, Dr. Hathaway, Mr. Harry Evans, and Mr. S. H. Nicholson.

LEAMINGTON AND COUNTY MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—

Entries for the open competitive musical festival to be held in June next, at Leamington Town Hall, close on April 20, or with late fee, May 1. Handsome trophies are being given for competition, and there is an attractive prize fund. Details are advertised.

THE entries for the Hastings Festival (May 22 to 24) show an advance on those of previous years. Visitors who seek to combine interesting musical experience with fresh air and pleasant surroundings should support this undertaking. The competitions will be held in the Public Hall.

THE People's Palace Festival (London, E.), the proceedings of which commence on May 10, and are continued on May 12, 13, and all through the following week, May 15 to 20, promises to be an unprecedented success. There are over 170 entries. Full programmes (6d.) can be obtained from Miss Edith Barran, hon. sec., 46, St. George's Court, Gloucester Road, S.W.

LONDONDERRY FEIS.

March 7, 8, 9, 10.

This 'Feis' always has an admirably thought-out programme. The music selected is of the very best, and it speaks volumes for the musical capacity of the district that so many competitors are able to cope with its technical and interpretative difficulties. The programme book is an interesting little volume. Some of its interest is derived from the very apt poetical quotations placed at the head of the particulars of each class. Later we shall give a selection for the benefit of others who would like to follow the Londonderry example. The chief results of the junior choral competitions were as follows:

LARGE SCHOOL CHOIRS.

- Tests: 'The old green lane' (Rathbone).
'Elfintown' (Bantock).
Cathedral Boys' School (Mr. Percival Coulter).
1st. Sion Mills National School (Mr. J. Watson).

SMALL SCHOOL CHOIRS.

- Tests: 'The voice of Spring' (Labbett).
'The flowerets are nodding' (Gartz).
Groarty N. S., Derry (Mr. J. Ramsay).
Bready N. S., Lisdivin (Mrs. T. Hunter).
1st. Cloughcur N. S., Donomana (Mrs. J. W. Reid).

OTHER CLASSES.

- First-prize winners:
'Sunbeam' Choir, Londonderry (Miss Norman).
Irish Society's Girls' School, Coleraine.
Cathedral Girls' School, I. (Miss Monteith).

The following were the prize-winners in the chief solo competitions:

- Soprano—Mrs. Acheson.
Mezzo-soprano—Miss Aileen Barry.
Contralto—Miss Winnie Woods.
Tenor—Mr. William J. Caskin.
Baritone—Mr. F. C. Simms.
Bass—Rev. T. W. Benson.

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS.

Tests: 'Who is Sylvia' (German).

'The Leprehaun' (Bantock).

- 1st. Maiden City Choir (Dr. D. C. Jones).
Tyrone.

CHURCH CHOIRS.

Tests: 'O Saviour of the World' (Goss).

Hymn, 'Fierce raged the tempest,'

Church of the Good Shepherd, Sion Mills (Miss G. Herdman).

- 1st. Killowen Church Choir, Coleraine (Mr. Freeman Crofts).
St. Thomas' Choir, Belfast (Mr. A. H. Derrick Large).
3rd. Drumragh Parish Church, Omagh (Miss V. M'Adams).
2nd. All Saints', Crooney, Derry (Mr. S. P. E. Smith).

STRATFORD (ESSEX).

March 18, 20, 22, 23, 24, 25.

This festival continues to progress, notwithstanding the establishment of other metropolitan festivals. It is obvious that in the east of London the appetite grows with what it feeds upon. More than 5,000 competitors appeared on this occasion. It is gratifying to note that the schools splendidly support the undertaking. This proves that the teachers are alive to the advantages derived from a carefully planned educational scheme, and that they are not influenced by some querulous objections to school choir competitions that now and again appear.

We are inclined to demur to statements that have found their way to the Press to the effect that Stratford initiated musical competitions in England. This is not history, for an East-End choir that for many years did loyal service to the cause of music, namely, the Bow and Bromley Institute Choir, was established on the strength of its success in winning the first-prize of £100 at the national music meetings held at the Crystal Palace in 1873.

The glory of the Stratford Festival will not be tarnished if this success of an East-End choir is acknowledged.

We regret that we cannot do more than chronicle the chief results of this mammoth event.

In the solo classes these were as follows:

PIANOFORTE.

- (Gold Medal)—Miss Beatrice Mutch.
(Senior)—Miss Freda I. Taylor.
(Age 17 and 18)—Miss Gladys Pettiford.
(Sight-reading, age over 14)—Miss Cissie Kerr.
(Sight-reading, Junior)—Miss Marjorie Truelove.

SOLO SINGING.

- (Gold Medal for Soprano)—Miss Louie Brooks.
(Gold Medal for Mezzo-soprano)—Miss Katherine M. Blake.
(Soprano, two classes)—Miss Frances Jenkins and Miss Marion B. Winfield.
(Mezzo-soprano)—Miss Marion Rowlands.
(Contralto, two classes)—Miss Cecilia Weiss and Miss Lucie Dunmore.
(Tenor)—Mr. Cecil Stephens.
(Baritone, two classes)—Mr. D. McGregor and Mr. Harold M. Burns.
(Bass)—Mr. William H. Fry.
(Sight-singing)—Miss Alice Edwards.

In the following lists of entries and results in the choral classes, the test mentioned is that prescribed for all the choirs in each class. There were also 'own-choice' pieces.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

(Challenge Class, Girls.)

Test: 'The enchanted spring' (Fletcher).

- 1st. Farmer Road C. S., Leyton (Mr. W. A. Cooke).
Vicarage Lane C. S., East Ham (Mr. Thomas Howard).
Winn Avenue Boys' School, Walthamstow (Mr. E. J. McClaren).
Loford C. S., Ilford (Mr. W. L. Norman).
Kensington Avenue C. S., Manor Park (Mr. F. E. Wilson).
St. John's School, Bethnal Green (Mr. R. C. Vine).
Shaftesbury Road C. S., East Ham (Mr. J. H. Heywood).
Central Park C. S., East Ham (Mr. A. B. Jennings).

ACTION SONGS (Children under 12).

- 1st. Fawbert and Barnard's School, Harlow (Mrs. E. M. Lowe).

Other prizes were won by the following schools and choirs:

George Green Secondary School (Mr. R. B. Elliott); Stratford Co-operative Junior Choir (Mr. A. Sears); Redcoat School, Burdett Road (Mr. H. Heywood); Upton Cross School, Plaistow (Miss Howship); Beckton Road Girls' School, Canning Town; Water Lane Evening School (Miss E. Nightingale); Plashet Park Congregational Band of Hope Choir, East Ham (Miss H. M. Haslam).

CHURCH CHOIRS.

(Men and boys) St. Michael and All Angels, Ilford (Mr. F. E. Wilson).

(Mixed voices) Woodford Congregational (Mr. H. Welton).

LADIES' CHOIRS.

Test: 'Come, lasses and lads' (arr. by Percy Fletcher).

- The Wealdstone Junior Choir (Mr. Edwin Aldridge).
Miss Macfarlane's Choir, New Barnet.

CHORAL SOCIETIES (Small).

Test: 'Hymn to the night' (H. Ernest Nichol).

- 1st. Miss Stanley Lucas's Choir, Hackney.
Mr. G. Day Winter's Part-Song Choir, Bow.
Mr. Hubert Welton's Choir, Woodford.
Bushwood Adult School Choir, Leytonstone (Mr. John Murphy).

CHORAL SOCIETIES (Open class).

Tests: 'Winter days' (Caldicott).

'Lady, see on every side' (Marenzio).

- Mr. G. Day Winter's Select Choir.
1st. Woolwich Co-operative Choir (Mr. John Hines).
Queen's Road Evening Commercial School Choir (Mr. Walter Penn).

In this open class we are glad to note that the allowance of an 'own-choice' piece was abandoned. A competition can not be classed as of the highest grade when miscellaneous tests are submitted for the embarrassment of the adjudicators.

The adjudicators were: Mr. Oscar Beringer, Dr. John E. Borland, Mr. Frederick Corder, Mr. Munro Davison, Mr. Ernest Fowles, Mr. Joseph Ivimey, Mrs. Tobias Matthay, Mr. George Oakey, Mr. Daniel Price, Mr. Richard R. Terry, and Mrs. Louisa Walker.

DOUGLAS (Manx Music Festival). March 28, 29, 30.

 Pianoforte solo (under 18)—Miss Lillian Coole.
 " " (senior)—Miss Nora G. Ribchester.

The adjudicators were Mr. Allen Gill and Mr. J. W. Irviney.

MORPETH (WANSBECK). March 31 and April 1.

Mr. Harry Evans was again the adjudicator throughout these competitions, which maintained their standard both in popularity and in musical results.

The following choirs entered. In the case of first-prize winners, the classes in which they were successful, and the tests, are indicated after the names of the choirs.

SCHOOL CHOIRS.

- Ashington Presbyterian S. S. (Mr. W. Collins).
 Barrington C. S. (Mr. T. Scott).
 Belsay (Mrs. Hugh Middleton).
 Cambo (Miss Morland).
 Pegswood (Mr. J. Barrow).
 Competitors under sixteen. Tests: 'Gentle swallow' (R. Rogers), and 'A song of fairies' (von Holst).
 Mitford (Miss MacLeod).
 Morpeth Corporation Girls' School (Miss Foster).
 Choirs of 25 to 40 voices. Tests: 'Cherry Ripe' (Horn), and 'Sweet and Low' (Luard-Selby).
 Netherwitton (Miss Temple).
 Action-Songs and Sight-Singing (Sol-fa).
 Rothbury Boys' School (Mr. Johnson).
 Stanington (Mr. T. Dixon).
 St. John's, Seaton Hirst (Mr. J. Vine).
 Hartburn and Netherwitton Junior (Lt.-Col. Orde).
 Hartburn (Mr. R. Dixon).
 Choirs of under 25 voices. Tests: 'Love, fare thee well' (Brahms), and 'Fairy elves' (Cuthbert Harris).

SENIOR CHOIRS.

- Bedlington Station P. M. (Mr. J. Moralee).
 Church and Chapel Choirs. Test: 'How lovely is Thy dwelling-place' (Brahms).
 Belsay (Mrs. Hugh Middleton).
 Cambo (Mrs. Charles Trevelyan).
 Novice choral societies. Test: 'Since first I saw your face' (Ford).
 Longframlington (Lt.-Col. Orde).
 Morpeth Y.M.C.A. (Mr. Arthur Platts).
 Male-voice choirs (one entry). Tests: 'Sorrow's tears' (Cornelius), and 'The roysters' (Luard-Selby).
 Netherwitton (Lt.-Col. Orde).
 Church and Chapel Choirs.
 Sight-singing.

 Wansbeck Gleemen.
 Felton (Mr. Phillips).
 Holders, retained Challenge Cup for choral societies. Tests: 'Corydon, arise' (Stanford), and 'Moonlight' (Fanning).

The entries in the senior classes were not encouraging. A class in which Weekes's madrigal, 'In pride of May,' and Dudley Buck's 'Hymn to music,' were the tests, drew no competitors. At the end the combined choirs sang Sullivan's 'O gladsome Light,' under Mr. Evans's direction.

YORK.

April 1.

Nine choirs entered for the annual choral competition of the North-Eastern Railway Employees' Choral Unions at York, on April 1. The test-piece was 'Moonlight' (Eaton Fanning). Mr. Newton Laycock (Sunderland) was the adjudicator. The Gateshead Railway Servants' Choir was successful in winning the 'Henry Tennant' shield. The York choir was placed second, and the Selby choir third. The other choirs which competed were Newcastle-on-Tyne, Hull, Hartlepool, Sunderland, Darlington, and Stockton. At the evening meeting the whole of the competing choirs, under the direction of Mr. Laycock, sang the test-piece, Buck's 'Hymn to Music,' Laurent de Rille's 'The Martyrs of the Arena,' and Pinsuti's 'In this hour of softened splendour.'

BRISTOL.

April 3, 4, 5, 6.

A substantial increase in the number of entries signalled in advance the success of this year's 'Eisteddfod.' It is gratifying to note the continued development of choral resources and activities.

The following were prize-winners in the solo classes:

- Soprano (two classes)—Miss Florence Smith; Miss Elsie Browning and Miss Florence Smith (bracketed).
 Mezzo-Soprano—Miss Lily Cleatworthy.
 Contralto (two classes)—Miss Florence Trimmell; Miss Gladys Lloyd.
 Tenor—Mr. H. J. Travers.
 Bass and Baritone—Mr. Harry Williams.
 Sight-singing—Miss Winifred Dayey.
 Pianoforte-playing (without age limit)—Miss Gladys Justice.
 " " (gold medal)—Miss Winifred Dayey.
 Novello-Davies' prize for ladies' singing—Miss Olwen Thomas (contralto).
 Open competition for men's singing—Mr. Frank Harrington (bass).

 Fishponds United Methodist (Mr. C. F. Clarke).

The adjudicators were: Dr. Cyril Roatham, Mr. E. T. Davies, Mr. Lionel Tertis, Mr. Claude Pollard, and Miss Dora Matthay.

COLERAINE (IRELAND).

April 6, 7.

This was the third annual festival held in this flourishing town, which is midway between Belfast and Londonderry. The festival was established by the zeal and energy of Mrs. Huston (hon. sec.) and Mr. Daniel MacLaughlin (chairman), and it has throughout been well supported by the local musical organizations and the gentry. The school and junior choral sections were much sub-divided in order that resources should be evenly pitted against one another. This led to a small number of entries in each class. In all there were twenty-one junior choir entries, besides five for sight-singing.

There were five entries in the chief choral class for adult choirs. The singing generally exhibited good capacity on the part of executants and trainers. Some of the school-singing was excellent. The chief results were as follows:

JUNIOR GIRLS' CHOIRS.

- 1st. Hon. Irish Society's Girls (Miss Beaton).
 2nd. Mark Street, Portrush (Miss Porter).

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

- Tests: (a) 'Hark, the bells' (Smart).
 (b) 'After the rain' (Pinsuti).
 1st. High School, Coleraine (Miss Duly).
 2nd. Portstewart (Mr. John Anderson).

SENIOR BOYS' CHOIRS.

- 1st. Coleraine Model School (Mr. Robert Henry).
 2nd. Killowen (Mr. Bryans).

SENIOR GIRLS' CHOIRS.

The standard reached here was the highest in all the school classes.

- Tests: (a) 'The Children's Angels' (Gounod).
 (b) 'Whispering wind' (E. J. Labbett).
 Tied 1 Mark Street, Portrush (Miss Porter).
 151. 'The Hon. Irish Society's Choir' (Mrs. McCulloch).

ADULT CHOIRS.

- Tests: (a) 'When Allen-a-cule' (Pearshall).
 (b) 'Lullaby of life' (Leslie).
 1st. Mr. Croft's Killowen Choir, 134 marks.
 2nd. Mr. Robert Martin's Coleraine Choir, 131 marks.

The junior choirs combined to sing in two sections, one singing 'Hark, hark, the lark' (Schubert) and the other 'Sweet and low' (B. Luard-Selby); and the adult choirs sang 'Forth to the meadows' (Schubert).

The proceedings of the two days were followed throughout by large audiences, and the interest was keen.

Dr. McNaught adjudicated.

BELFAST. April 8, 9.

This Festival is making progress by convincing the wide and populous district to which it appeals that its purpose is educational. There were upwards of one hundred entries on this occasion, and they occupied Mr. R. H. Wilson, the adjudicator, for two whole days. The children's competitions were very popular. There were some excellent action-songs, in which the St. Paul's National School (Miss M. Ellis) excelled. Ormeau Road (Miss R. Diddle) was first in the boys' choir class, and Fountainville (Mr. Sheppard) was first in the girls' choir class, and in the mixed class Ormeau Road was again successful. The High Street Presbyterian Society (Mr. K. N. Erskine) was first in the church or mission choir class. There were three separate classes for warehouse, shop, or factory choirs. The Tower Buildings (Choir, Lowry & Co.'s Choir and the Emer Club) were all first-prize winners. In an open female-voice choir class the Holywood Girls came first. The prize in the Band of Hope choir class was won by the Great Victoria Street Presbyterians. Besides the choral classes there were others for solo singing, junior and adult. The festival has yet to capture the ordinary choral societies, but nevertheless it is accomplishing its task in creating chorists who will ultimately feed these societies. The president of the festival is Professor W. B. Morton, of the University, and Mr. J. E. MacIlwaine is the secretary. Miss McKissock, Mr. F. H. Sawyer, and Mr. F. J. Moffett are among the well-known members of the profession who interest themselves in the scheme.

ABERGAVERN. Easter Monday.

The Easter Bank-holiday Eisteddfod held in this beautiful district is always a popular one. On this occasion the attendance was excellent. The entries promised a fine choral exhibition, but as is only too usual at these gatherings, there were many disappointing withdrawals.

It is a pity that this casual treatment of the public cannot be visited by some penalty. In this case the Eisteddfod managers were not to blame, because they received the entries in the usual form, and were not told of withdrawals until after the programme had been circulated. But worse, some of the conductors did not take the trouble even to send a message.

There were classes for solo and quartet singing, pianoforte, violin, and choral classes for juveniles, female-voice choirs, male-voice choirs, and mixed-voice choirs.

Seven choirs out of ten that entered sang in the Congregational choir class. The test was Woodward's 'The radiant morn,' and the first place was won by Hartlebury (Mr. R. A. Taylor). There were two male-voice choir classes. In that for small choirs the test was 'The Northmen's song' (Kücken). Only three choirs sang, out of six that entered. The Orpheus Glee Party (Mr. J. D. Evans) came first. In the large choir section the test was 'Deep Jordan's banks' (D. Cyril Jenkins), and six of the eight entries appeared. There was some fine singing, and the first place was gained by Treharis (Mr. Fred Evans). In the 'second' choral mixed-voice class, the test was 'His yoke is easy' (Handel). Seven choirs had entered, and four sang. Brynmawr (Mr. W. T. Angell) was first. In the chief choral class for choirs of from 150 to 180 voices, the test was 'Great and wonderful' (Spohr). Five well-known choirs had entered, but only two appeared, viz., Newport and Cardiff. Both sang finely, Cardiff showing some slight advance and therefore gaining the first prize of £70. In the ladies' voice section, Troedyrhiw (Miss K. Jones) was the winner. There was delightful singing in the children's choir section, more especially in the matter of rhythm. Tonally there was a disposition to sharpen. But of the three choirs entered, that from Troedyrhiw—again conducted by Miss K. Jones—sang very charmingly, and was conspicuously first. Dr. McNaught, Mr. Walter Nesbitt, and Mr. Norman McLeod adjudicated.

MOUNTAIN ASH. Easter Monday, April 17.

This Eisteddfod is always an important one. As was the case at Abergavenny on the same day, some of the choirs that had entered were conspicuous by their absence. Three fine choirs appeared in the chief choral section, and Dr. Walford Davies, the principal adjudicator, paid them high tribute. Rhymney was placed first with 75 marks out of 80, Newport second with 73, and Mountain Ash gained 70. The test was the chorus 'O Jerusalem' (Sir Hubert Parry). There were also three choirs in the second choral section. Trefores was first with 77 marks, and Treycynon second with 72. Nine choirs competed in the chief male-voice section, and the Maritime Choir was awarded the first place with 76 marks. Four juvenile choirs sang, and the Troedyrhiw party came first. Dr. A. T. Silver and Mr. Fred Jones were assistant adjudicators.

(Other competitions are reported in the School Music Review.)

THE EHREMAVER SYSTEM of Sight-
Playing is not an evasion of, or substitute for, any part of a pianist's musical training. It is the means by which a pianist may acquire, quickly and easily, the ability to read all his new music at first sight. By its aid a pianist obtains much greater proficiency in sight-playing by three months of fifteen minutes' daily practising than is possible by the drudgery of years of practising for many hours daily by ordinary methods.

Booklet containing full particulars sent free on application to L. M. EHREMAVER, 27, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

PIANOFORTE PLAYING

is robbed of all its drudgery when you use the MACDONALD SMITH SYSTEM, though this is the least of its benefits to the Pianist.

One way of becoming fully convinced of its absolute thoroughness and success is by applying to those who have used it, e.g., to the pupil who writes:—"You HAVE OPENED A NEW WORLD TO ME." (Name and address on application.)

Tuition by post to any part of the world. Write for "Light on Pianoforte Playing," free by post.

MACDONALD SMITH'S SYSTEM OF PERFECT TOUCH AND TECHNIQUE.

COMPLETE COURSE OF LESSONS BY CORRESPONDENCE,
THREE GUINEAS (by instalments if desired).

Course "B" for Beginners, Course "C" for Players.

"PIANOFORTE PLAYING," and other Articles

by MACDONALD SMITH, 33 pp., post-free, 7d.

Terms and Conditions for Personal Lessons (to Concert Players only) on application.

The Musical Times

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

JUNE 1, 1911.

THE NOVELLO CENTENARY.

With this number of the Musical Times we present our readers with a supplement giving a history of the century-old firm of Novello and its connection with and influence upon the development of music in England. Centenaries, apart from their intrinsic interest, have the virtue of inducing us to take comprehensive bird's-eye views of things—of changed conditions and of roads traversed. It would be a poor business indeed if musical England could not congratulate itself on some progress during the past hundred years; but when we survey the whole record we have exceptional cause for satisfaction. In the first decade of the 19th century England hardly counted among the musical nations of Europe, certainly so far as composition was concerned. In the oratorio the Handelian influence was still too strong to permit original talent to assert itself. The more profitable kinds of public music, such as the opera, were mainly in the hands of the foreigner. Instrumental music was practically non-existent. The only departments in which we achieved any work of the least distinction were those of the glee and the anthem. Something still remains to us of Samuel Wesley, Webbe, Callcott, and Spofforth; next to nothing remains of Dibdin, Shield, and Storace, or even Bishop. Yet we were steadily working our way up to a place in the estimation of the musical world. Our best composers in each generation since 1850 have been getting nearer and nearer to the stature of their leading contemporaries in other countries. Our choral singing has become the envy of the world. In the general quality, if not the quantity, of our public music we need not be afraid of comparison with any of our foreign friends. The secret of it all, perhaps, is that the scope of the composer's and the concert-giver's appeal has been enormously widened, decade by decade, by ever-fresh masses of the people finding opportunities for the development of that love of music that is innate in every one of us. It is no paradox to say that in the final resort the quantity and quality of musical art in a country depend not upon the number of those who sing and play or compose, but upon the number of those who merely listen. To increase these is the first and last and constant requisite. The firm of Novello cherishes the belief that in this important sphere it has achieved much during its hundred years of life. The history of the House is the history of cheap music; and it is cheap music, more than anything else, that helps to make the art the universal thing it should be.

ALFRED HENRY LITTLETON.

The Editor of the Musical Times has succeeded in inducing Mr. Alfred H. Littleton, the head of the firm of Novello & Co., to overcome his natural distaste for publicity and allow a short biography of himself to appear in the present issue of the journal. He has more than one claim on our attention at the present moment—his approaching completion of fifty years of active connection with the firm of Novello, his position as Master of the Musicians' Company for the current year, and the functions of the firm in general, and himself in particular, in contributing to the entertainment of the International Musical Congress. But apart from these public or semi-public activities, the record of his life is interesting enough for its own sake.

Mr. Alfred Henry Littleton is the eldest son of the late Mr. Henry Littleton, the partner and successor of Alfred Novello. Mr. Alfred Littleton first saw the light in London, on February 15, 1845. He received his general education at University College School in Gower Street. Afterwards he went to a German school at Heidelberg, where, among other things, he acquired a certain knowledge of languages which has often stood him in good stead. He remembers that during these days he and his young fellow-students used to go to the Mannheim opera, where he heard 'Tannhäuser' and 'Faust' long before those works came to England. The general verdict of the schoolboys was that 'Tannhäuser' was a greater work than 'Faust,'—a critical opinion of some interest, considering the date and the circumstances.

His first musical experience was as a very small choir boy in a small choir at Lambeth. Every Sunday he sang, as lustily as strength would permit, in that now faded masterpiece, Jackson's Te Deum in F. This was a standing dish, so to speak, at that and countless other churches. Music might come and music might go; but Jackson in F went on for ever. Not that there was anything slavish or timorous about the organist at Mr. Littleton's church. He was a man of towering ambition and almost reckless daring, as was shown by the fact that on one occasion he attempted Boyce in A. But there is a limit to what even the most unflinching courage can perform; so after this giddy flight the choir came back to Jackson in F, never to leave it again. The next musical experience to which Mr. Littleton can look back, was a solemn introduction to Alfred Novello, who gravely asked him whether he had a pocket. The small boy as gravely replied that he had, whereupon Alfred Novello dropped half-a-sovereign into it. It was only later that it dawned upon the innocent boy that if he had said he had half a dozen pockets the sun might have shone still more brightly that day. He has never ceased to regret this obvious mistake.

He himself is modest about his musical attainments, both then and now, maintaining that he 'found it impossible to become a musician.' He took lessons on the organ from George Cooper, the sub-organist at St. Paul's under Goss, from Aylward on the violoncello, and from Joseph Barnby on the pianoforte and in harmony. The only way he can account for something very striking not coming of all this instruction is to suppose that his teachers were failures. In 1862, at the age of seventeen, he was taken into business by his father. In another year, therefore, he will have completed half a century of business life. His father never considered any serious undertaking without careful consultation with him, and placed the greatest possible confidence in his judgment. He entrusted him, among other things, with the arrangement and the finance—the latter a considerable item—of the oratorio concerts the firm of Novello gave under the conductorship of Barnby. In 1873 Mr. Alfred Littleton initiated a series of daily concerts in connection with the Exhibition at South Kensington. These took place at the Albert Hall under Barnby's direction, and lasted from April 14 until October 31. In 1874 he helped to promote an undertaking of even greater importance, consisting of a season of nightly concerts extending over seven weeks. Many of the present generation will open their eyes on learning that this half-forgotten or unheard-of series included a weekly Oratorio performance and a weekly Wagner night. It will be agreed that the organizer of this scheme was possessed of a daring and enterprising spirit in advance of his time. There is a tendency for each generation to take to itself the credit of the developments of its particular age, and to forget the pioneers who brought them about. May it not be justly said that this enterprise, although it occurred at a time when the public were unprepared for so startling a scheme, contained the seeds of the extraordinary progress of orchestral and choral music during recent years? The expense of these concerts was mostly borne by Mr. Henry Littleton, with a certain amount of support from the Albert Hall Corporation. Mr. Alfred Littleton's labours were lightened by the assistance of his old schoolfellow, Mr. Charles Fry, who recently retired after being connected with the House of Novello for practically fifty years.

Mr. Littleton was only twenty-six when his father sent him to New York to open and organize a branch of the firm in that city, which was carried on with more or less success for some time. He stayed there nine months. The musical conditions of New York in 1871 were, as may be imagined, very different from those of to-day. There was no Metropolitan Opera House then, but operatic performances were being given by Carl Rosa. Looking back at some of these early experiences, Mr. Littleton is often surprised at the audacity of youth,—the confidence it has in itself, the bigness of the schemes it undertakes. Alfred Novello, for example, began publishing at the age of nineteen; he was only twenty-six when he published Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul.' Mr. Henry Littleton seemed to have the same confidence in youth; for not only did he entrust so much that was of importance to his son Alfred, but in 1877 he handed over to the younger brother, Augustus, the sole charge of the printing and bookbinding works of the firm in Southwark Street. (Later on, by the way, Mr. Henry Littleton himself paid a visit to New York, and the business of the branch was transferred to Messrs. Peters & Co.)

The next episode in his life that Mr. Alfred Littleton remembers clearly was the visit of Verdi to England in 1875. Messrs. Ricordi, of Milan, and Messrs. Escudier, of Paris, made arrangements with Novello's for four performances of the 'Requiem' in the Albert Hall, which it fell to Mr. Littleton's lot to organize. He provided the choir and the orchestra, and Verdi brought with him an eminent quartet of soloists—Madame Stolz, Madame Waldmann, Signor Masini, and Signor Medini. Verdi himself conducted. During the negotiations Mr. Littleton and Barnby had to visit Paris to discuss certain details with Verdi. They found him seated on a kind of big throne at his hotel, with a number of his admirers grouped around him. Victor Hugo, it will be remembered, used to accept similar acts of admiration, not without complacency. The Verdi incident gave Mr. Littleton an insight into one or two of the peculiarities of the Latin temperament—the deference it loves to show to great men, and the apparently theatrical way in which that deference is sometimes shown. These Albert Hall performances of the 'Requiem,' of course, laid the foundations of the popularity of the work in England.

In 1870 and 1871 Mr. Alfred Littleton saw a great deal of Gounod, who was then living in this country. The relations between the composer and the firm were somewhat strained at one stage, but friendliness was ultimately restored. It was Mr. Henry Littleton's knowledge that Gounod had been working at the 'Redemption' from about 1870, and himself thought it his masterpiece, that induced Novello's to pay the large sum of £4,000 for the copyright when the oratorio was produced at the Birmingham Festival of 1882. Gounod was very fond of quoting Rossini's bons mots, of which he remembered a large number. One which specially pleased him was the following: 'There is good music—there is bad music—there is Ambroise Thomas!'

The year 1876 was rich in experiences for the subject of our sketch. As all the world knows, the Bayreuth Theatre was opened in that summer. Mr. Littleton and his father, after a short stay at Cologne, where they visited Ferdinand Hiller, attended the second cycle of the 'Ring.' From Bayreuth they went to Leipzig, whence they brought over to England a staff of expert music engravers. They also called upon Brahms in Hamburg. Mr. Littleton remembers that the composer was clean-shaven, and looked very different from the bearded Brahms of the ordinary portraits. They tried, but in vain, to conclude some business arrangements with the great composer; his semi-humorous excuse was that he did not want to have to 'write two letters' every time he composed a work. The real reason, there was little difficulty in seeing, was his close association with another publisher. He was exceedingly genial, however, and generously gave up time to showing them all the sights of Hamburg.

The next great landmark—indeed one of the greatest—in Mr. Littleton's life was the visit of Liszt to England in 1886. In 1885 an American Concert Society thought of performing Liszt's 'St. Elizabeth,' and asked the firm of Novello if they would issue an English edition of it. According to the law of copyright at the time it was open to the firm to publish the work without consulting or rewarding the composer. This, however, Mr. Henry Littleton could not bring himself to do. It was decided to ask Liszt to revise a final set of proofs, and to accept a substantial honorarium for doing so. The unexpected proposition greatly gratified the master; the proofs, it may be added, came back without a solitary mark upon them. In discussing the prospectus for the Oratorio Concerts (conducted by Sir Alexander Mackenzie) for the season of 1885-86, the question of giving 'St. Elizabeth' arose, and led to the suggestion that Liszt should be invited to come to England and be present at the performance. At first little hope was entertained of inducing him to do so. The attempt, however, was made. An invitation from Mr. Henry Littleton was sent to him; this was supported by the persuasions of Liszt's pupil, Walter Bache, Sir Alexander Mackenzie (who had seen a good deal of Liszt in Florence shortly before), and other influential friends.

Liszt finally promised to be in England on April 1, 1886, but he lingered on at the house of Munkacsy, in Paris, so long that in the end it had to be conveyed to him that a company of four hundred people had been invited to meet him at Mr. Littleton's house at Sydenham on Saturday, the 3rd of April. Then he managed to tear himself away from Paris. Mr. Alfred Littleton went to Calais to meet him, Walter Bache, who was a bad sailor, not daring to venture beyond Dover. They both brought the venerable old man in safety and comfort to Sydenham, the mail train having been specially stopped at Penzance for them. At the station some Hungarian residents in London presented Liszt with an address; and it was eight o'clock in the evening before he arrived at Westwood House, where the guests were already assembled to meet him. On Tuesday, the 6th, 'St. Elizabeth' was performed at St. James's Hall, Sir Alexander Mackenzie conducting. The Prince and Princess of Wales, Princess Louise, and the Duchess of Edinburgh honoured the composer with their presence. Mr. Littleton was almost constantly in the society of Liszt during the latter's two weeks' visit. He conceived the same enthusiastic admiration for Liszt's character that the great pianist and composer created everywhere; and he has many instances to narrate of Liszt's nobility of nature, delicacy of feeling, and exquisite consideration for others.

On January 1 of the following year (1887) Mr. Henry Littleton transferred the business of Novello & Co. to Mr. Alfred Littleton and Mr. Augustus Littleton and their brothers-in-law, Mr. George T. S. Gill and Mr. Henry W. Brooke.

In April of the following year Mr. Alfred Littleton strongly supported the efforts which resulted in the appointment of Sir Alexander Mackenzie (whose acquaintance he had made some years previously) as Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, an office in which the composer has been able to do so much for musical progress in this country. The other candidates for the office were Joseph Barnby and Walter Macfarren, the latter retiring in Sir Alexander Mackenzie's favour. Barnby soon after became Principal of the Guildhall School of Music, Mr. Littleton again having been able to give considerable aid in securing the appointment. In May, 1888, he had the misfortune to lose his father. For the last twenty-four years, therefore, he has been the oldest and the leading representative of the firm.

In 1889 he joined the Musicians' Company at the suggestion of Sir Frederick Bridge. Sixteen years later he became a member of the Court of the Company, and last year rose to the highest office in it, being elected Master for 1910-11. In addition he is a member of the Committee of the Royal Choral Society—which he was invited to join on the cessation (1889) of the concerts conducted by Sir Alexander Mackenzie,—and of the Council of the Royal College of Music, to which he was elected at the suggestion of the first Director, Sir George Grove.

The outward events of his life have continued to be comparatively uneventful. In 1896 the firm became a Limited Company, and in 1904 the migration was made from Berners Street to the present dignified home of the House, in Wardour Street. The celebrated Vauxhall statue of Handel, by Roubiliac, which adorns the entrance, was his gift to the Company; the statue was acquired by his father from the Sacred Harmonic Society at its dissolution. But if the outward existence of Mr. Littleton has been, as he is glad to reflect, on the whole lived out of the glare of publicity, it has been rich in inward experiences.

With all the leading English musicians of each generation, of course, his association has been particularly close—most intimate of all with Barnby, Sir John Stainer (who withstood many temptations to allow his works to be published by other houses), Sir George Martin, and Sir Alexander Mackenzie. He has seen, in his forty-nine years of business life, many noteworthy developments in musical England, and he counts it as one of his pieces of good fortune that during his period of headship of the largest firm of music publishers in England there has come the significant development of English music with which the firm of Novello is inseparably associated, and the welcome recognition of Elgar's genius in every part of the musical world. In his home at Lancaster Gate he has gathered round him a rich collection of books and art treasures, and certain portraits of especial interest,—that of Handel by Denner, that of Arne by Zoffany (these two having come to him from his father), and a fine one of Purcell that is attributed to Kneller. His books testify at once to that knowledge of music which he modestly disclaims and his taste as a connoisseur of beautiful things that are worth loving for their own sakes. An idea of the range of his collection may be had from the fact that during the International Musical Congress there will be on view at Wardour Street a selection of one hundred rare volumes from his library, exhibiting the progress of the art of music printing from its beginning in the fifteenth to the end of the seventeenth century. He has not lived so much in the larger world of music, and brushed up against so many notable personalities, without acquiring a breadth and sanity and tolerance of outlook that are plainly evident in his conversation. He has seen many changes in public taste, but has always been able to sympathise with the best there was in each of them. He is naturally not in full accord with some of the more questionable experiments of the present day; and he quotes with approval a saying of Gounod's that 'the next great composer will be great in virtue of his simplicity,'—which seems more than likely. Both in private and in business life his tact, courtesy, and consideration for others, and his willingness to efface himself for the good of a cause, have won him general esteem and affection. Our readers will join with us in wishing Mr. Littleton many more years of life in a business which for so long has afforded opportunities for doing service to the cause of musical art and assisting its progress.

WAGNER'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

BY HERBERT THOMPSON.

It has long been known that Wagner left behind him an autobiography, dictated by him to his wife in the years following his call to Munich. It is frequently referred to in his letters: in one to his sister Luise Brockhaus, written in January, 1866 ('Familienbriefe,' p. 259), he says: 'I have recently had a pleasant occasion for thinking of my family: amid all the distractions of my strange life in Munich I dictated in the evenings my biography, with which I have up to now arrived at my twenty-first year: naturally you all appear in it, and it has moved me greatly to think over my youth, which remained with perfect clearness in my recollection . . . Naturally this writing is not intended for publication: it is intended to serve, after my death, as an accurate guide for those who may be called upon to describe my life to the world.'

Now, at last, after more than forty years, it has been thought fit to make public this most interesting document, which has just been published by Bruckmann, of Munich, under the title, 'Mein Leben, von Richard Wagner.*' A prefatory note by Wagner explains the circumstances under which the memoirs were related at the request of his wife, and were set down by her from his dictation; how a small number of copies were privately printed, and how it was necessary to postpone their publication till after his death, for the value of the book depended upon its 'unadorned truth,' and its statements must be accompanied by names and other details, the premature publication of which might cause needless offence. In the book itself there is no indication whether it is a literal reproduction of the original, or to what, if any, extent, it has undergone revision, but from a preliminary publishers' announcement we are given to understand that 'with the omission of only a few passages' it is a true and unaltered copy. Fortunately there is ample intrinsic evidence in both contents and style of the genuineness of the memoirs. The multitude and exactness of the details, even of his earliest years, bear witness to the strength of his memory, but it appears that he did not have to rely entirely upon his recollection, for he tells us how, in 1835 (when he was twenty-two), he found himself at the 'Weidenbusch' Inn, in Frankfurt, with some time on his hands, which he occupied by setting down, with exact particulars of dates, materials for his biography—'the same,' he adds, 'which I have by me at the present moment, to refresh my memory, and which since that time I continued in an uninterrupted sequence during different periods of my life.'

But if one acquires, in reading this remarkable biography, confidence in the accuracy of its statements, one also realises that it is so strongly coloured by the writer's personality that it cannot be regarded as an impartial view of the circumstances of his career. It is exceedingly frank; he does not spare himself, especially in those early years which were, when he wrote, sufficiently remote to be regarded with a certain aloofness. But those who are foolish enough to expect a severely judicial attitude will naturally be disappointed. It was a part of the strength of Wagner's personality that he had a profound conviction of the absolute truth of his position in Art, a sublime confidence which led him to project schemes which seemed impossible, an egotism which made him regard his own view of Art as the only possible one. All this made him appear to his contemporaries a very conceited, arrogant personage, and no doubt he was, like many geniuses, self-centred, intolerant, and angular; but it is to be remembered in his favour that if he made himself anything but a persona grata to his acquaintances, he had always a following of devoted friends, whose sympathy made him reveal many traits of an unsuspected amiability. It is not surprising, then, that these memoirs are strongly coloured with their author's personal prejudices, and one feels that many episodes are susceptible of another interpretation than that which he gives them; but this very fact enhances the value of the book as a human document of intense interest, and one which, apart from the facts which it relates, throws a vivid light on Wagner's character and personality.

The fulness of the autobiography may be realised when it is mentioned that the narrative, which covers only about two-thirds of Wagner's life, finishing with his call to Munich by Ludwig II., in 1864, occupies no fewer than 870 quarto pages, and goes into minute and interesting details. In the very first page we find the contradiction of a rumour which has of late obtained some credence, to the effect that Wagner was not the son of his reputed father, but of his supposed step-father, Geyer. As this would make him of Jewish origin, it was seized hold of with avidity by the scandal-mongers, who found it rather piquant that the author of 'Das Judenthum in der Musik,' should himself be half a Jew. Mr. Huneke, in his book entitled 'Overtones,' declares that this was 'an open secret,' and that Wagner himself admitted it in his 'manuscript' biography. Now that it has appeared, we find he does nothing of the sort, but gives the accepted account of his birth, which we may continue to regard as correct until much stronger evidence than mere irresponsible gossip has been brought against it. Of his childhood a very clear and most interesting account is given. His earliest recollections were of the theatre—with which his step-father was connected—and he tells how, in about his sixth year, he appeared in a tableau at the performance of a pièce de circonstance, 'Der Weinberg an der Elbe,' with music by Weber, attired as an angel, sewn up in tights, and with wings on his shoulders, assuming with difficulty a 'graceful' attitude. Later he took even the small 'speaking part' of a child in Kotzebue's 'Menschenhass und Reue.' Of his life as a school-boy in the ancient little town of Eisleben, he gives some interesting details, and tells how his lasting love of acrobatic feats had its origin in the sight of a troupe of tight-rope dancers, who performed in the market-place, and how the performances by a military band of the Hunters' chorus from 'Freischütz,' then a novelty, quickened his love of music. What strikes one as the most characteristic feature of these childish recollections is the vivid imagination of the boy, who (when returned to Leipsic) slept in a room hung with old portraits, which seemed to him alive, and caused him many sleepless hours. Elsewhere he relates how, if he were left alone in a room for any length of time, the articles of furniture would seem as if alive, and it is not surprising if the 'properties' of the theatre assumed in his eyes a distinct yet mysterious personality. The mystical impression which the first hearing of an orchestra awakened in him is still more easily comprehended. 'The very tuning of the instruments put me into a state of mysterious excitement: I recollect in particular how the sound of the fifths on the violins appeared to me like a greeting from the spirit-world.' The opening of the 'Freischütz' overture took the imaginative lad straight into the land of magic, and another piece which made a strong impression on him was the 'Fidelio' overture (in E). The whole story of his musical and dramatic development is most interesting, but too long to be reproduced here: his introduction to Beethoven's Symphonies through hearing the Seventh, and to his physiognomy by means of the lithographed portraits, and the sympathy kindled by learning about his deafness and his retired life; his admiration for Mozart, beginning with his acquaintance with the 'Requiem,' and raised to enthusiasm by the second finale in 'Don Giovanni'—these are among the many circumstances which helped to influence him. Of his tragedy, 'Leubald und Adelaide,' written when he was fifteen, we have minute particulars. Shakespeare's 'Hamlet,' 'Macbeth,' and 'Lear,' and Goethe's 'Goetz von Berlichingen,' contributed to it, and the title indicated his enthusiasm for the composer of 'Adelaide,' as did his desire to provide music for it after the fashion of Beethoven's 'Egmont' music. All his knowledge he seems to have acquired in a haphazard fashion: he was a quick but erratic scholar, who learned easily just what he liked, and nothing else. Philology interested him, but mathematics he would not look at, and no wonder he was the despair of his teachers, was practically expelled from the public school of Leipsic, and was virtually self-taught in all things save music, in which luckily he found a sympathetic teacher in Weinlig ('Weinlich' he spells the name), who somehow persuaded his difficult pupil to submit to a thorough course of fugue-writing, a method which, though it led to no remarkable immediate results, no doubt laid the foundation-stone of the contrapuntal edifice of 'Die Meistersinger,' erected many years later. He also, before this, had taken lessons on the violin, and had got so far as to be able to play some of Mayseder's Variations in F. Whether his technique was any better than that of his self-taught and very elementary method at the pianoforte does not appear, but we gather that his violin performances were not of striking excellence, for he adds, with quiet humour, that his family did not seriously urge him to prosecute his studies any further. The influence of Schröder-Devrient upon his art is well known, and some of his recollections of her singing have already been published separately, as have other extracts relating to the first performance of the 'Liebesverbot,' the removal to Germany of Weber's body, the account of the Dresden performance of the Choral Symphony, the recollections of Spontini and possibly some other portions which now reappear in their proper places in the story. The impression which Schröder-Devrient made upon Wagner by her singing in 'Fidelio' was one of the factors which made him a Beethoven-worshipper; another, perhaps still more potent, was the Choral Symphony, which 'became the focus of all my fantastic musical ideas and aspirations.'

The score he studied diligently, and made not only a careful copy of it, but arranged it for the pianoforte and sent his transcription to Schott's, the publishers, who in return presented him with the score of the 'Missa Solennis.' In the opening of the Symphony he discovered to his delight the long-sustained fifths—the interval which played so important a part in his childish experiences, and which here, as he says, appeared to his imagination as 'the spectral ground-tone of his own life.' Curiously enough, it seems to have been the Choral Symphony which was the medium by which he acquired a temporary distaste for the German School which it typified. It was given yearly at the Gewandhaus, where, according to custom, the instrumental movements were played without a conductor, and 'went off as smoothly as a Haydn Symphony,' after which Pohlenz, a 'typically genial, fat music-director,' appeared to conduct the choral portion in a fashion which made Wagner wonder whether, after all, Beethoven had not written nonsense. This and other experiences, especially Schröder-Devrient's performance in Bellini's 'Romeo and Juliet' at Magdeburg, under Wagner's own direction, combined to make him fancy that in the Italian music there lay a warmth and spirit not to be found in that of the German School. Under this illusion he wrote his early opera, 'Das Liebesverbot,' which he describes as very frivolous in character, and 'Rienzi,' which he planned (with characteristic audacity) on a scale suitable for the resources of the Paris Opera.

The end of this period when he was, so to speak, sowing his wild oats as a musician, came when, in Paris, he heard Habeneck conduct the Choral Symphony at a Conservatoire concert. He realised then how empty was the operatic music he had been conducting at Magdeburg and Riga, and turned back to Beethoven like a repentant Prodigal Son, the earnest of his repentance being the 'Faust' overture, upon which he at once set to work, while he soon gave a further proof of his renewed allegiance to his fatherland in 'The Flying Dutchman,' which he planned about this time.

The outward circumstances of Wagner's early career are told with a wealth of detail far exceeding even the lengthy biographies of Glasenapp or Ellis. It is impossible, and would not be quite fair, to attempt even to refer to all the many matters of interest, not a few of which are now made public property for the first time. One or two, however, may be instanced. His student career in Leipzig was short and stormy. So bellicose an individual soon found himself in conflict not only with the authorities, but with his comrades, and he was speedily involved in duels with three of the most renowned fire-eaters of the day, each of whom was, however, providentially removed or incapacitated before the appointed day, so that Wagner—much, as he admits, to his satisfaction—escaped without hurt to either his honour or his person. He describes with much force a student-riot in which he was involved, and the description of how the tumult grew, and how he and others took part in it without knowing why or whom they were fighting, gives one the impression that here we may seek the origin of Hans Sachs's soliloquy on the meaningless fury of a popular tumult, 'Wahn, Wahn, überall Wahn.' For the source of the actual street-riot in the 'Mastersingers' we may point to a disturbance he witnessed in Nuremberg one night, when a personal disagreement grew rapidly to something like a tumult, which abated as rapidly as it had arisen, and Wagner 'could saunter home arm-in-arm with his brother-in-law, laughing and joking, through the moonlit streets.' The least pleasant episode in his student life was a sudden and happily fleeting passion for gambling, and he tells quite frankly how in his madness he gambled away even money which belonged to his mother, till he came to his last thaler, on which he staked his whole future. Had he lost he must have fled, dishonoured and penniless, but with this his fortune turned, and he not only won back all he had lost, but sufficient to pay all his debts. He went home in the early dawn, and after the first night's rest he had enjoyed for a long time, woke up a different man. He made a clean breast of all his misdeeds to his mother, who, after thanking God, told her son she felt assured he would never fall back into such a course of life. And indeed he never experienced the temptation again.

WHO WAS BEETHOVEN'S 'UNSTERBLICHE GELIEBTE.'

BY ERNEST NEWMAN.

The love affairs of great men are always fascinating, though there may be a touch of impertinent curiosity in the interest we take in them. The fascination is increased when there is some uncertainty about the matter; nothing that a man can tell us of himself gives us quite the joy of discovering it for ourselves. There is an amateur detective concealed in every one of us. The only excuse, indeed, for prying into a dead man's secrets is that we do not want to know them for their own sake but simply to have had the pleasure of ferreting them out; just as the hunter pursues the fox for exercise' sake, not because he has any feeling against the animal, or needs him for food.

For anybody with the detective instinct there could be no better subject to practise his wits upon than the question of the identity of Beethoven's 'immortal beloved.' It will be remembered that after his death three letters, —or three fragments of one letter—were found by Stephan von Breuning in a secret drawer in the composer's room. They are by far the most ardent of all Beethoven's expressions of affection; they are sometimes almost incoherent through sheer heat and haste. They give no indication as to whom they were addressed, nor the place from which they were written, nor the year; the first fragment is headed '6th July in the morning'; the second 'Monday evening, July 6th,' and the third 'Good morning on July 7th.' The problem of the 'immortal beloved' has been exercising the minds of scores of Beethoven investigators during the past seventy years. According to Schindler, Nohl, Marx, Kalischer and others, the immortal beloved was the Countess Giulietta Guicciardi. Thayer and Grove held her to have been the Countess Therese von Brunsvik. Frimmel alone puts forward the theory that she was Magdalena Willmann. Recently Wolfgang Thomas has made a most ingenious attempt to prove that she was Amalie Sebald. A good deal, of course, depends upon the year in which the letters were written; and on this point also there has been a pleasing variety of conjecture. For a long time the Guicciardi theory had the most adherents, Kalischer's book 'Die Unsterbliche Geliebte Beethovens' (1891) having convinced many waverers. When Max Hehemann translated Grove's 'Beethoven and his Nine Symphonies' into German he threw over the author's theory as to Therese von Brunsvik, professing himself a convert to the reasoning of Kalischer. In the play founded on Beethoven's life that Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree produced a year or two ago, it was Giulietta Guicciardi, I think, who figured as the immortal beloved. One Mariam Tenger made a gallant attempt, a generation or so ago, to prove the identity of the beloved with Therese von Brunsvik; but there was so much that was purely imaginative in her demonstration that she fell an easy prey to Kalischer. The latter was so confident of the truth of his own theory that in his complete edition of Beethoven's letters he boldly—and most reprehensibly—heads the letters 'To Countess Giulietta Guicciardi,' and prints them among the correspondence of 1801. Recently, however, the discussion has taken a new turn, and the Guicciardi theory may be said to be quite discredited. The three most notable contributions to the subject of late years are La Mara's book 'Beethovens unsterbliche Geliebte: Das Geheimnis der Gräfin Brunsvik und ihre Memoiren' (1909), Wolfgang Thomas's 'Die unsterbliche Geliebte Beethovens: Amalie Sebald' (1909), and Max Unger's 'Auf den Spuren von Beethovens unsterblicher Geliebten' (1910). In addition there is an excellent summing up by Hugo Riemann in the new third volume, just issued, of Thayer's 'Life of Beethoven.' For those who are interested in the subject, but have not time to go into the matter fully themselves, the following summary of the evidence may be useful.

It was the egregious Schindler, who is answerable for so many errors in connection with Beethoven, who first floated the Guicciardi theory. The composer had spoken to him of Giulietta in 1823, in language that showed on what affectionate terms the two had been many years before. This was enough for the good Schindler; he promptly dated the letters 1806, and surmised them to have been written from a Hungarian watering-place. Then Thayer showed that Giulietta had married Count Gallenberg on November 3, 1803, and gone to live in Italy. But the heroic invention of Schindler was never baffled by a mere fact; in the third edition of his book he altered 1806 to 1803, and smiled as blandly as before. We know, however, that Beethoven spent the summer of 1803 at Oderdöbling, near Vienna, not in Hungary. Thayer held that Beethoven visited Count von Brunsvik in the summer of 1806; but subsequently a letter from the composer to Breitkopf & Härtel was discovered, bearing the date 'Vienna, 5th July, 1806,' which makes it impossible for him to have been in Hungary on the 6th. Moreover, neither in 1803 nor 1806 was July 6 a Monday. La Mara, in pursuit of evidence for her theory as to Therese von Brunsvik, obtained access, a few years ago, to this lady's Memoirs. [She died unmarried in 1861, having devoted the greater part of her time and her income to founding institutions for the care of children.] The Memoirs which La Mara publishes in her book indicate that Beethoven and Therese were on terms of more than usual friendship; but they also make it clear that in the summer of 1806 Therese was in Siebenbürgen. La Mara then suggested that the letters might belong to 1807; this is inconsistent with July 6 being a Monday, but as Beethoven was notoriously careless in the matter of dates it is not impossible that he may have made a mistake either in the day of the month or the day of the week. On the other hand it must be remembered that he writes '6th July' twice—morning and evening—and 7th July once, so that there is hardly likely to be any error here; while as for the day of the week, Sunday and Monday are, as Riemann points out, the two days least likely to be confused by any one.

Obviously the first thing to do if we are to clear up the muddle is to adopt Thomas's plan of seeing where Beethoven was in each year in which July 6 was a Monday. These years were 1795, 1801, 1807, 1812 and 1818. The latter may be ruled out at once. Beethoven was in Mödling at the time, and in any case there is no evidence of a love-affair then; in that year Beethoven was forty-eight. Frimmel decides for 1795, to support his theory as to Magdalena Willmann. But there is nothing to show that Beethoven was in a watering-place that summer; and Thomas pertinently points out that there was no reason why he should be, his malady not having yet developed. As for 1801, there is again no evidence of a sojourn in a watering-place. Further, if the letter to Wegeler which Kalischer dates June 29, 1800, should really be dated June 29, 1801, as seems probable, this makes it practically impossible for any such visit to have taken place. [This letter is full of details as to Beethoven's illness. On November 16, 1801, he gives more information, evidently in reply to Wegeler's inquiries. It is incredible, on various grounds, that the letters should be separated by an interval of seventeen months.]

In 1807 Beethoven seems to have been not in Hungary with the Brunsviks, but at Baden. On these lines, then, only 1812 remains.

Before going further it should be noted that almost every early investigator followed Schindler in the theory that the letters were written from a Hungarian watering-place. It is a curious illustration of the sheep-like docility of the human mind. There was not an atom of evidence as to the watering-place being in Hungary; perhaps the mention of Prince Esterhazy in the letters was sufficient to confirm every one in the original error. The letters are too long to be given in full here, but the passages essential to the inquiry may be quoted. [I make use of Mr. Shedlock's version in his translation of Kalischer's complete edition, vol. i., p. 47.]

'6th July in the morning.

'Just a few words to-day, and indeed in pencil (with thine)—only till to-morrow is my room definitely engaged . . . Can our love endure otherwise than through sacrifices? . . . My journey was terrible. I arrived here only yesterday morning at four o'clock, and as they were short of horses, the mail-coach selected another route, but what an awful road; at the last stage but one I was warned against travelling by night; they frightened me with a wood, but that only spurred me on—and I was wrong, the coach must needs break down, the road being dreadful, a swamp, a mere country road; without the postillions I had with me I should have stuck on the way. Esterhazi, by the ordinary road, met with the same fate with eight horses as I with four . . . We shall probably soon see each other.'

'Monday evening, July 6.

'I have just found out that the letters must be posted very early Mondays, Thursdays—the only days when the post goes from here to K . . . . My love has made me one of the happiest, and at the same time one of the unhappiest of men—at my age I need a quiet, steady life. . . . I have just heard that the post goes every day.'

The letters make it clear (1) that Beethoven's ardent love was fully returned; (2) that he was in some place so far from Vienna that four post horses had been required; (3) that just before reaching his destination he had been in the company of the beloved.

Now the Brunsviks had a country seat at Korompa, in Hungary. La Mara hereupon surmised that K stands for Korompa, and now suggests that the letters were written in 1807 from Pystián, a small watering-place near by, Beethoven having just come from a visit to Therese and her brother Franz. As we have seen, the 6th July in that year was a Monday, so that the theory works fairly well up to this point. But in the Memoirs Therese distinctly says that she and her mother spent July, 1807, in Carlsbad, having gone there in June. This reduces La Mara to the desperate expedient of supposing an error in Therese's dates. She makes Therese's journey take place in July instead of June. In any case, as Thomas says, if Beethoven had been the guest of the Brunsviks in the early part of July he would have known of their migration to Carlsbad, and would not have written to Therese at Korompa.

If 1807 be rejected, only one year is left us—1812; and there seems now to be not the least doubt that that is the year in which the letters were written, and that K stands for Karlsbad,—Beethoven being in the habit of spelling the word in that way. Thayer's objection that as Beethoven wrote from Vienna on June 28, 1812, he could not have been in a Hungarian watering-place by July 6 loses its point as soon as the watering-place is located in Bohemia. We know him to have been in Prague on July 2. On the 17th he writes to Breitkopf & Härtel that he has been in Teplitz since the 5th. In the Visitors' List his name appears under the date of the 7th, but it can be shown that these lists were often wrong to the extent of a day or two.

Beethoven tells Breitkopf & Härtel 'we are here since the 5th July.' This agrees with what he says in the letter dated July 6—'I arrived here only yesterday morning at four o'clock.' From the remark 'only till to-morrow is my room definitely engaged' it looks as if he changed his quarters on the 7th, when he would come under the eye of the compilers of the List. All this confirms the correctness of Beethoven's dates, and makes it unnecessary for us to admit into our calculations any year in which July 6 was not a Monday. [Prague, by the way, is about 150 miles north-west of Vienna as the crow flies, Teplitz about another fifty miles in the same direction, and Carlsbad about fifty miles south-west of Teplitz.] Varnhagen von Ense and Goethe were in Bohemia at this time, and from their diaries, letters, &c., together with Beethoven's own correspondence, we can get a thoroughly connected record of the composer's movements. All the evidence points to the love-letters dating from this period. Beethoven speaks of the road being a swamp; we know that the summer of 1812 was exceptionally wet. He speaks of needing a quiet, steady life at his age; he would be far more likely to think thus in 1812, when he was forty-two, than in 1795, 1801, or 1803. The handwriting of the letters is that of Beethoven's middle period. Further, Riemann points out a curious similarity of idea and phrasing between a passage in the letters, and one in a letter written to his little friend Emilie M. on July 17, 1812. 'Your pocket book,' he says, 'shall be preserved among other tokens of the esteem of many men, which I do not deserve.' Compare this with the following sentences from the love-letter: 'Persecuted here and there by the kindness of men, which I little deserve, and as little care to deserve.' Max Unger has discovered from an old publication, 'Der Badegast in Teplitz,'* that the Reichspost to Prag, Carlsbad and Eger went on Monday mornings at eight. This agrees with Beethoven's remark in his second letter, written on Monday evening—'I have just found out that the letters must be posted very early Mondays, Thursdays, the only days when the post goes from here to K.' The next morning he writes 'I have just heard that the post goes every day.' Had he, in fact, read to the end of the 'Badegast,' he would have found, after the enumeration of the routes, that 'from 15 May to 15 September the post arrives each morning from all the Austrian territories, and goes daily at 11 a.m.'

There can be no doubt, then, that the letters belong to the year 1812, which effectively puts the Giulietta Guicciardi theory out of court. Wolfgang Thomas, to whom belongs most of the credit of clearing up this part of the subject, holds the 'immortal beloved' to have been Amalie Sebald. Beethoven had met this young lady, who, by the way, fascinated Weber also, at Teplitz in 1811. She was an intimate of the circle of Tiedge and the Countess von der Recke. She was certainly in Teplitz in September, 1812, for we possess a number of letters addressed to her by the composer during that month. She may possibly have been there in August, or even in July. Thomas surmises that Beethoven may have seen her in Prague shortly before his departure on July 4. [On the 14th he writes to Varnhagen von Ense: 'I was sorry . . . . not to be able to spend the last evening with you at Prague. I myself felt that it was not the right thing, but a circumstance which I could not foresee prevented me from doing so.'] We learn from Fanny Giannatasio del Rio's diary that in September, 1816, Beethoven spoke of having had an unhappy love affair with some one whose acquaintance he had made five years before, and whom he had hoped to marry. Thomas takes this as confirming the Amalie Sebald theory. But Fanny Giannatasio is merely reporting a conversation held between her father and Beethoven; so that we cannot attach full credence to the remark as to the composer having 'made her acquaintance' in 1811. Kalischer says that Amalie Sebald married about 1815. If that date be correct, how could it be she of whom Beethoven speaks on May 8, 1816 (in a letter to Ries) as 'one who probably (!) will never be mine'? Even Fanny Giannatasio says, 'There was no longer any thought [of marriage], almost an impossibility.' Beethoven and Amalie did not see each other after 1812; but Thomas thinks that his love for her never died out, and that she is not only the 'unsterbliche Geliebte' but the 'entfernte Geliebte' of the beautiful song-cycle the composer wrote in 1816.

* The date of this is 1816, but it is fairly safe to assume that the same arrangements were in force in 1812.

Altogether the evidence for Amalie Sebald is not strong. Everyone must be struck by the much cooler tone of the authentic letters to her; they are friendly, and indeed affectionate, but not more so than Beethoven's ordinary correspondence with people he liked. Of the fiery passion of the letters of July there is not a trace. These make it clear that the composer's love was returned as warmly; whereas the Sebald letters, if they indicate any love-making at all, seem to show that Amalie was holding herself aloof from Beethoven. Riemann, after weighing the whole of the new facts very judiciously, decides against Amalie Sebald, and is inclined to favour Therese von Brunsvik, though he admits that no certainty is possible. We know that the relations between Beethoven and the Brunsvik family in 1812 were again very cordial. Therese was then living in Wittschap, not far from Prague. She had an uncle in Prague; could she have been visiting him early in July, and there have met Beethoven again, the result being a revival of their old passion? Family pride, as well as Beethoven's precarious circumstances, would account for the refusal of Therese's mother to allow the marriage to take place. Her Memoirs tell us that in 1814 she refused an offer of marriage, 'a previous passion having wasted my heart.' The whole problem is complicated by Beethoven's amazing comprehensiveness with regard to women. His friends tell us that he was always in love with some one or other. Giulietta Guicciardi, Frau von Frank, Bettine Brentano, Countess Erdödy, the three daughters of the tailor with whom Ries lodged, Therese Malfatti, Therese von Brunsvik, Amalie Sebald—these, and no doubt others, attracted him from time to time. The recent re-dating of a number of his letters puts it practically beyond doubt that the marriage project of 1810 had reference not to Therese von Brunsvik but to Therese Malfatti. He was certainly quite sincere in all his loves, but he was capable of swift transitions. All we can say finally is that the love letters undoubtedly belong to 1812, and that a number of considerations make it more likely that the addressee was Therese von Brunsvik than any one else. It is not impossible, of course, that the letters may have been written to some one of whom we know nothing; but in view of the fulness of the record we have of Beethoven's life almost month by month this is extremely improbable. It looks as if Wolfgang Thomas were right in his dates and wrong in his inferences, while Thayer, Grove, and La Mara are right in their inferences and merely wrong in their dates. In any case the Guicciardi theory is no longer tenable.

CONCERNING MUSICAL CRITICISM.

BY ARTHUR HERVEY.

The April number of the Musical Times contains an extremely interesting article concerning Mrs. Rosa Newmarch, whose delightful essays on composers and their works adorn the pages of so many of our concert programme books. Discussing the limits of criticism in programme annotation, Mrs. Newmarch remarks that in writing of a new work, she makes it 'a principle to avoid criticism of a kind which might in the smallest degree check or cool the enthusiasm of the public, who are not yet familiar with it'; and she adds later on, 'Most people are capable of some sort of carping criticism for themselves. But to point—with due discrimination—to the things which seem lastingly beautiful in a work can do no harm, and must do good. I think the lack of balanced appreciation is one of our worst faults as a musical nation.'

Now as regards the programme annotator, the value of these words cannot be denied. They are of course not attributable in the same manner to the critic, whose business it is to judge a work to the best of his ability, and to point out its defects as well as its qualities. But the last of the sentences quoted above concerns more or less everyone, though it may be remarked that a lack of balanced appreciation is a fault shared by other musical nations besides ours.

Indiscriminate praise or blame are equally bad, and it behoves a critic to guard as much against an excess of enthusiasm as to fall into the other extreme, though it is certainly better to be too merciful than too severe, and to err on the side of leniency. A properly balanced appreciation is unfortunately not always so easy to achieve. It is important, however, to be very careful not to overshoot the mark either way. For instance, if a new work had aroused one's admiration to a more than usual extent, it would be an exaggeration to state off-hand that no finer work had ever been composed. On the other hand, to condemn a composition which had not appealed to one, and to fail to discover any redeeming feature in it, would be assuming a still greater responsibility. Sincerity is of course one of the greatest attributes of a critic, and freedom from bias is another. That the two are not invariably allied is shown in the case of Schumann. Unflinchingly sincere in the expression of his opinions, it certainly cannot be averred that the great composer was free from bias, and his very sincerity sometimes caused him to express his ideas with undue warmth and bitterness. It is only necessary to allude to his notorious article on Meyerbeer's 'Huguenots' to emphasise the point. This article has been accorded a fame far beyond its merits, for it is in reality an extremely bad piece of criticism. It is bad because it conveys an entirely wrong idea of the work, bad because its conclusions are erroneous, bad because it displays a narrowmindedness of spirit on the part of the author, and proves his inability to judge a work, the conception of which does not accord with his own ideas. In order to justify what I say, I need only revert to the words which Schumann puts into the mouth of Florestan: 'In the "Crociano" he still counted Meyerbeer among the musicians, with "Robert le Diable" he hesitated, but with "The Huguenots" he classed him at once with Franconi's circus troupe.' In other words, Schumann placed 'Il Crociato,' the last of Meyerbeer's purely Italian operas, far above either of the two succeeding works! Any musician who takes the trouble to compare the scores of these three operas will be able to realise how absolutely misleading are these words. 'Il Crociato' was produced in 1824, and if here and there—notably in the Introduction, which has a character of its own, and in certain dramatic recitatives—there are indications of a more individual outlook, yet the main features of the opera are those of the florid Rossinian style in vogue at the time. During the six years or more which separate this work from the production of 'Robert le Diable,' an almost radical transformation seems to have taken place in the composer's methods. Certain Italian features remain, but the style has become far more individual and the master stands on his own feet. The progress is more evident still in 'The Huguenots,' and it is indeed hardly conceivable that the composer of 'Il Crociato' should have risen to such heights. All this is of course well known to musicians, and I only mention it in order to show what value is to be attached to the words quoted above, or indeed to the entire article in which they figure.

Curiously enough, Schumann seems to have been if anything more annoyed by the subject of Meyerbeer's opera than by the music. The introduction of Luther's chorale revolts his feelings as a good Protestant, and he declares that one would search in vain throughout the opera for a pure thought or a truly Christian sentiment. This takes one altogether out of the domain of musical criticism, but it nevertheless divulges a peculiar method of reasoning when one remembers that in this opera the sympathies of the audience are throughout enlisted in favour of the Protestants! Truly the lack of balanced appreciation has never been exemplified to a greater extent. Altogether far more remarkable is the article written by Berlioz on the same work. The tone throughout is enthusiastic, and one can see that the French master admired this opera quite as much as Schumann disliked it. At the same time the critical observations are sound and to the point. The same applies to Berlioz's article on 'Le Prophète,' which Schumann disdained to criticise at all, but dismissed with a simple cross as unworthy of any consideration whatsoever! Meyerbeer was not by any means the only famous composer attacked by Schumann, who on the other hand wrote enthusiastically concerning various long since forgotten contemporary musicians. One must, however, not minimise the value of many of his criticisms and remarks on music. The pity of it is that the article on 'The Huguenots,' should be so often quoted as an example of critical insight, whereas it is really the reverse. The excuse which may be made for Schumann is that by the character of his genius he was constitutionally incapable of appreciating or even judging fairly works conceived according to principles foreign to his nature. Now everyone is not a Schumann, but everyone has his likes and his dislikes, everyone is attracted by one sort of music or by another. Therefore it follows that the conscientious critic who is anxious to render full justice to a work which he recognises as possessing merit, but which does not strike a responsive chord in his own nature, is obliged to do violence to his feelings or at any rate to modify his opinions: that is, if he desires to give anything like a balanced appreciation. The question is whether a criticism founded on such principles is worth anything, and whether a sincere outspoken opinion, even if it be an erroneous one, is not preferable? This is not so easy to answer as, perhaps, it may seem. Many points have to be taken into consideration before expressing an opinion which may have momentous consequences on the future of a composer. A work which has taken weeks—possibly months, or even years—to compose, often has to be judged in as many minutes; and this owing to the conditions unhappily prevailing in London, which oblige the critic of a daily paper to send in his copy before he has had time properly to digest the music he has just heard. Under these circumstances the difficulties confronting the critic are very great indeed, and if he sometimes takes refuge in vague generalities it is impossible to blame him. Assuming that he has proper time to think the matter out, the question arises as to whether he is sufficiently eclectic to be able to put himself into the composer's place, to realise what he has aimed at, and to determine whether the existence of the work is justified by the results obtained. I think it must be admitted that an enormous improvement has taken place in this direction during recent years. A less narrow-minded spirit prevails. If a composer writes unconventionally he is not necessarily treated as if he were a criminal. Insults such as those which were heaped on masters like Wagner, Liszt, and Berlioz are happily not resorted to nowadays. The entire tendency of the age is different. Far from abusing composers of so-called advanced views, critics, even if they cannot sympathise with them, are inclined to express themselves temperately. A new spirit is in the air, which everywhere is making itself felt. This desire to encourage rather than hinder the composer is admirable. It must, however, never be forgotten that in the kingdom of music there are many mansions, and that it is unnecessary to belittle the past for the sake of glorifying the present, by adopting tactics the reverse of those employed of yore. It is just as foolish to assume a disdainful attitude towards those composers who were looked up to yesterday, or the day before, as it was formerly to crush the musician who had anything new to say. Music is never at a standstill, and its manifestations are various. The time will surely come when whole-tone scales and other experiments in sound will become hackneyed. The present will have become the past. At the rate things are going, this may occur sooner than one expects. The need for balanced musical appreciation has never been more necessary than now. To judge the productions of former generations according to the ideas of the present day would be manifestly absurd, and a criticism to be worth anything should take into account the period in which the work has been written, the conditions which may have affected its production, the personality and the nationality of the composer, axioms which are not invariably put into practice. It is well to remember at this juncture that Wagner, in what is perhaps his greatest work, has given an admirable example of liberty combined with sanity, and that if he holds up the pedant to ridicule in the person of Beckmesser, he also, through the lips of Hans Sachs, proclaims his reverence for the masters of the past.

I have read with great interest the thoughtfully written articles contributed by Mr. Ernest Newman and M. Calvocoressi to the Musical Times, advocating a school for musical critics. Although fully recognising the able manner in which the question is discussed, I fear that the idea is Utopian, and even if it were realisable I do not see that it would advance matters to any appreciable extent. In order to establish a school, it is first necessary to find the teachers and furnish them with some basis upon which to found their teaching. Assuming this to be possible, which I very much doubt, what would be the result? The enactment of various doctrines, which would tend to hamper individuality of judgment. I know that this is not what is intended, but it is what I believe would occur if this idea were to be put into practice. No, it stands to reason that a critic must have a special knowledge of his subject before he ventures to write about it. If he then expresses himself as well as he can, and is sincere in what he says, this is all that can be expected of him. Look, for instance, how divergent are the opinions held by many excellent musicians!

Who is to decide which of them is right? Music cannot be considered as a branch of mathematics! In endeavouring to realise a proper balance of appreciation, a critic need not by any means abdicate his own individual ideas, for he can state both views of the matter if he likes, and explain the reasons which actuate him in the adoption of one or the other. Mr. Ernest Newman says that 'if our desire is to attain rightness of judgment, we must always be testing our own opinions and those of others by applying broader and broader principles to them,' an excellent piece of advice. But who will be able to decide ultimately whether the final judgment is the right one? The upshot of the matter is that music is an art upon which it is impossible to dogmatise. What appeals to one musician leaves another cold. This can be realised daily, and the whole matter resolves itself into a question of individual feeling which all the arguments in the world will not affect.

At the same time, there is a great deal in the above-mentioned articles which is worthy of earnest consideration. For instance, the distinction between opinions and statements of mere fact, suggested by M. Calvocoressi, is a point which cannot be over emphasised. This is one out of several valuable remarks which the budding musical critic would do well to take to heart.

Occasional Notes.

The following works will be performed at the Three Choirs Festival to be held at Worcester Cathedral, September 10 to September 15:—Tuesday morning: 'Elijah.' Tuesday evening: New choral work, 'The sayings of Jesus,' Dr. Walford Davies; 'Coronation Te Deum,' Parry; Motet, 'Throne of mercy,' Cornelius; Choral Symphony, Beethoven. Wednesday morning: 'Parsifal' (Act 3), Wagner; 'Stabat Mater,' Palestrina; new Symphony in E flat, Elgar. Wednesday evening (Public Hall): Miscellaneous concert, including a new work for orchestra, Prelude to 'Edipus at Colonus,' Granville Bantock. Thursday morning: 'St. Matthew Passion,' Bach. (For this performance a new edition is being prepared by Sir Edward Elgar and Mr. Ivor Atkins.) Thursday evening: New work for baritone solos and chorus, 'Five mystic songs,' Dr. Vaughan Williams; Violin concerto, Elgar; Requiem, Mozart. Friday: 'The Messiah.' The conductor of the festival will be Mr. Ivor Atkins.

On May 19, Madame Melba visited the Guildhall School of Music. She has presented that institution with a singing scholarship of the annual value of £30, and the reception was arranged to mark the general appreciation of her generosity. It was fortunate that an address she had composed for delivery on the occasion was fully written out, for her emotion at the warmth of her greeting so overcame her that she had to seek Mr. Landon Ronald's assistance in the delivery of her remarks. Most appropriately the topic of the address was 'Singing in English,' which was all the more welcome from the fact that Madame Melba's brilliant career as an opera singer is more associated in the public mind with foreign languages. As regards the fitness of the English language for song, she confessed that at one time she thought that it did not lend itself felicitously to expression, but now in her maturer judgment, experience told her that she had been wrong. She believed now that while English lent itself to music less readily than Italian, it was equal in this respect to the French language, and superior to the German. The reason for the somewhat bad reputation of English as a singing language was, she believed, not that it was inherently unadaptable, but that its diction was not properly cultivated. She declared that 'our ears are tortured too frequently by mispronunciation and verbal obscurities, and at times to such an extent that it is difficult to decide in which particular language the singer is delivering his message.'

One of the most acute remarks the great prima donna made was that inaccurate pronunciation and obscurity tended to awaken a hostile critical attitude amongst the audience, and thus created a feeling of unrest and destroyed the burden of the message. The language should be sung as it should be spoken, with just sufficient added distinctness, 'or one might use the word exaggeration,' to counteract the obscuring effect of the singer's voice and the pianoforte or other accompaniment. She instanced the word 'love' as a particularly long-suffering one, and she humorously asked the lady students what they would say to a man who declared, 'I loive you.' Then as to the letter 'r'; she ridiculed its trill in the words 'heart' and 'darling,' which were so often sung as 'hearrt' and 'darrling.' The treatment of the words 'garden' and 'forest' were contrasted. She argued that the tongue was not wanted in the former word, but was wanted in the latter; so in the one case the 'r' is passive and in the other active.

The address closed with an eloquent appeal to singing students to make themselves acquainted with fine English poetry—Shakespeare's sonnets, Keats's 'Ode to a Grecian urn,' Shelley's 'Ode to a skylark,' and many other of the poetic ecstasies with which our beautiful language is so rich. She advised them to learn such poetry by heart, and to speak it aloud with distinctness and understanding, and so to bring to their singing the glory of a perfect diction.

The failure of the Musicians' Company to discover a march worthy of gaining their prize has been seriously taken to heart in many quarters. A lady whose name we do not remember having seen before, wrote to a contemporary that she had submitted a bright and easy march, and yet no prize was awarded! Mr. Holbrooke considers that 'the assertion made that no march was good enough (out of 200 sent in) for performance at the coming celebration a fearful slight on the composers who sent in their work,' an opinion which takes us 'no forrader.' He also makes an arbitrary statement that there never has been a good work obtained by such means, and 'the best is always discarded, naturally.' We, and the majority, will be more inclined to agree with the Morning Post, which upholds the wisdom of the judges—'the decision of the Company not to countenance an unworthy composition is to be commended, for there would be no gain to the cause of native music by giving its approval to indifferent work.' The outcome of the competition is of course regrettable, but it does not seem a reason for great dissatisfaction. It is by no means an easy task to write a good march. How many composers have succeeded in doing it really well? There is no inconsistency in the failure of our prolific writers of tone-poems and fantasies to find inspiration when fettered by the essential rhythmic sameness, simple design, and superficial idiom of a popular march.

The elevating influence of the competitive movement is the subject of frequent illustration and comment. The East London Observer provides us with a further instance of its working:

There are many who wander among the bye-ways in the purlieus of East London who must have been puzzled at the sudden popularity among the children of a quaint and beautiful old Somersetshire folk-song:

'Dashing away with a smoothing-iron,
She stole my heart away.'

The street boy whistles it; the girls 'act' it; and we are informed that 'nearly every one in Toynbee Hall goes about rejoicing over his loss to the tune.' This delightful exemplification of the capacity of East London children for better things than slangy music-hall songs or whining waltz-airs from 'musical comedies,' picked up from street-organs, is due to the fact that 'Dashing away with a smoothing-iron' is one of the songs in which school choirs, boys' clubs, cripples' guilds, and all sorts of children are competing at the People's Palace Musical Festival this week. Let none who wish to keep their hearts young miss hearing the children 'dash away with the smoothing-iron,' and reflect that English, Scotch, Welsh, and Irish country folk can give to London children a thousand songs as fascinating as the charming Ironing Song from the West Country.

The meetings of the International Musical Congress (May 29 to June 3) obviously cannot be reported in our present issue. As we have already shown, they will unfold a panoramic view of British music such as has never before been exhibited on one occasion. In the Coronation period, when the glories of our great Empire are being happily celebrated, it was a peculiarly appropriate course to associate our national achievements in the art of music with the general jubilation. In addition to the social receptions announced in our last issue, we are glad to state that direct Government recognition has been afforded by an invitation from Earl Beauchamp to one hundred members of the Congress to a lunch at the House of Commons on the afternoon of Saturday, June 3.

Universal satisfaction, or rather relief, will be felt throughout England at Sir Henry Wood's decision to reject the opportunity of becoming conductor of the New York Philharmonic Concerts, and to continue his manifold activities in his native country. A London autumn season without Wood in charge of the Promenade Concerts would be 'unthinkable.' He is, moreover, our chief bulwark against the intrusion of Continental conductors into the chief festival posts in England.

Messrs. Novello are preparing a Short Festival Te Deum for voices and orchestra, written by Sir George Martin at the request of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, to be performed at the Special Thanksgiving Service at the Cathedral on Thursday, June 29, when their Majesties The King and Queen will be present.

In connection with the recent publication of Wagner's 'Mein Leben' it is interesting to hear that a translation by Mr. W. Ashton Ellis of 'The Family Letters of Richard Wagner' will shortly be issued by Messrs. Macmillan.

MACKENZIE'S 'TAM O' SHANTER.'

(THIRD 'SCOTTISH RHAPSODIE.')

'Of Brownies and of Bogillies full in this Buke.'
(Gawin Douglas.)

Among the orchestral items announced to be performed during the International Musical Congress is a new rhapsodie by Sir Alexander Mackenzie. This is the only work which has been expressly composed for the occasion. In this rhapsodie the composer has attempted a musical illustration of Tam o' Shanter's weird adventure, so graphically described by Burns in his immortal poem, on that memorable night when :

... a child might understand,
The devil had business on his hand.

Following the poet's lines, the work divides itself naturally into three contrasted, but continuous sections, and opens with snatches of the famous drinking-song 'For the cock may crawl, the day may daw' :

which precede Tam's reluctant departure from the cosy inn and merry cronies with whom he has been carousing.

Before him lies a long road, and of evil repute ; but 'O'er a' the ill's o' life victorious,' he trots cheerily homeward, on his grey mare Meg, into the darkness and the storm :

Whiles holding fast his guid blue bonnet,
Whiles crooning o'er some auld Scots sonnet,
While glow'r'in round wi' prudent cares,
Lest bogles catch him unawares.

A sinister subject appears, in the violas, before he has proceeded far on his way :

The pace increases until horse and rider approach Alloway's ruined Kirk, 'Where ghaists and houlets nightly cry' : and the trusty mare, sniffing danger and hearing uncanny sounds 'stood sair astonished.'

But heroic Tam, with a courage derived from 'inspiring bold John Barleycorn,' urges her to venture slowly and cautiously towards the window, which blazes with brilliant light :

There he witnesses the fearsome sight of an orgie of 'witches and warlocks in a dance,' to which Auld Nick himself supplies the eerie music of 'Hornpipes, jigs, strathspeys and reels' on the pipes.

This is the principal theme of the wild reel :

When the unholy revel is at the height of its frenzy, the exceptionally capricious and supple caperings of a young witch cause Tam to lose his wits completely, and, in uncontrollable excitement, he roars out his approval :

'Weel done, Cutty-sark !'
And in an instant all was dark.

Tam has barely time to rally his mare :

So Maggie runs, the witches follow.

And the final movement describes his flight before the angry fiends. Of the manner of his narrow escape, let the poet tell :

Now, do thy speedy utmost, Meg,
And win the key-stone o' the brig :
There, at them thou thy tail may toss.
A running stream they dare na cross.

The main subject of this last section is :

But before the key-stone of the bridge is reached the infuriated witch who leads the pursuit, just misses seizing her intended victim : she only succeeds in wrenching off the mare's tail as a trophy :

But little wist she Maggie's mettle.
Ae spring brought off her maister hale,
But left behind her ain grey tail.

Thanks to Maggie's agility, her master is saved ; and from this point onwards the pace gradually slackens, first to a canter, then to a comfortable trot. Tam's courage revives : the bacchanalian refrain once more rings in his ears, and in spite of his gruesome experiences, he reaches his homestead in, we fear, an unrepentant mood.

The vigorous tune of Burns's famous anacreontic, 'Willie brewed a peck o' maut,' has been adopted as the chief theme of this, the composer's third 'Scottish rhapsodie.'

HENRY ABYNDON, MUS. BAC.,

CHOIRMASTER OF THE KING'S CHAPEL,
IN 1455.

By W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD.

So little is really known of the English musicians of the 15th century that any new light is welcome. All musical writers note the fact that Henry Abyndon was Mus. Bac. of Cambridge University in 1463 (February 22), being the first musical degree recorded in England. There is some reason to believe that musical degrees were provided for at Oxford by Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, in 1439 or 1440, but so far no actual record of such a degree being conferred at that date has come to light.

Henry Abyndon was born about the year 1418, and we first meet with him in 1444, when he was a musician in the chapel of Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester. On January 7, 1445, Duke Humphrey gave him a grant of £8 yearly for life, from the issues of Hadley Ree and Legh Ree, Essex, a proviso being added that 'if Humphrey die before him Henry Abyndon shall have the same for life.' This grant was confirmed by privy seal of King Henry VI., on November 7, 1446. We next hear of him as Succentor of Wells, to which post he was appointed on November 24, 1447, in succession to John Bernard.

In 1452, Abyndon was famed both as a singer and an organist, and, in addition, he was in high esteem as Master of the Song at Wells. We are not therefore surprised to learn that on the death of John Plummer, he was promoted to be Master of the Song, or Choir-master, of the King's Chapel, in 1455. All previous writers give the date of his appointment to the royal chapel as 'May, 1465,' but a reference to the Patent Rolls disproves such a statement. The actual date was September 29, 1455, and the grant was confirmed by the King on March 16, 1456. In this grant Henry Abyndon was appointed for 'the instruction and governance of the ten boys of the chapel of the household; at a salary of 40 marks yearly from Michaelmas last, the date of his appointment, to wit, 20 marks from the issues of Norfolk and Suffolk, and 20 marks from the issues of the counties of Cambridge and Huntingdon, so long as he have the said instruction and governance; so that he act by advice and survey of the Dean of the Chapel.'

It is well-known that the Dean of the King's Chapel had the privilege of impressing suitable men and boys for the choir; and there is an interesting entry in the Patent Rolls under date of July 9, 1453, by which Thomas Lisieux, Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, obtained protection for all choristers and ministers of St. Paul's, such that 'neither the dean of the King's Chapel nor any other officer or minister of the King shall take any such chorister or minister for the use and service of the King or other against his will.' Another entry, under date of November 14, 1454, affords us the information that Nicholas Sturgeon, Canon of St. Paul's—an eminent composer—who had helped to complete the Cathedral Library, had recently died, which fixes the date of Sturgeon's compositions as contained in the Old Hall MS.

So great was King Henry the Sixth's love for music that on March 10, 1456, he issued a commission to Walter Halyday, Robert Marshall, William Wykes, and John Clyffe, empowering them to impress boys 'elegant in their natural members and instructed in the art of minstrelsy, and to put them in the King's service at the King's wages, to supply the place of certain of the King's minstrels deceased.' Again, on July 14, 1458, the King granted for life to John Turgess, Queen Margaret's harper, 100 shillings yearly from the preceding Michaelmas, in lieu of a similar grant which had been annulled by the Act of Resumption. On July 17, 1459, a like grant of 100 shillings yearly was made to Thomas Greene, King's minstrel, and a similar grant was made to William Wykes, King's minstrel, and to John Clyffe, King's minstrel, on June 7, 1460.

On March 2, 1462, Henry Abyndon was granted the sum of £8 yearly for life, from the issues of the Castle manor, or lordship of Hadleigh, Co. Essex. A year later, as before stated, he was admitted a bachelor of music at Cambridge,* and King Edward IV., on July 2, 1465, confirmed his appointment as Master of the Song of the Chapel of the King's household, at a salary of 40 marks yearly for the clothing, instruction and governance of the boys of the Chapel. His royal appointment was confirmed in 1471 and again in 1474.

In 1478, Abyndon was promoted to be Master of St. Catherine's Hospital, Bristol, and on September 29 of the same year he was succeeded by Gilbert Banaster as Master of the boys of the royal chapel. From the Patent Rolls of Richard III. it appears that the pension of £8 yearly, for life, which Abyndon had been given by Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, and had been confirmed by Henry VI. and Edward IV., was confirmed by Richard III. on March 3, 1484, on fine of 20 shillings paid into the hanaper.

It may be necessary to mention that the King's Chapel, or the Royal Chapel of the Household, was distinct from St. George's Chapel, Windsor. King Edward IV., in the twenty-second year of his reign, on February 28, 1483, established the chapel of the household as a foundation in the King's free chapel of St. Peter, within the Tower of London, consisting of a Dean and three Canons, 'one of whom shall be sub-dean, another treasurer, and the third precentor.' Master John Gunthorpe was appointed Dean; Nicholas Hewys, sub-dean; Richard Surlond, treasurer; and John Chirche, precentor; and the foundation was formally incorporated as 'the dean and canons of the royal free chapel of the household.' By the terms of the foundation the said Dean and Canons were granted in mortmain the free chapel of St. Peter, with all rights, appurtenances, &c., with licence to acquire lands, rents, advowsons of churches, to the value of £100 yearly. Strangely enough, the first Dean, John Gunthorpe, died within two months of his appointment, and so, on May 16, 1483, William Chauntry was given 'the deanery of the free chapel royal of the household.'

Henry Abyndon retained his post as Succentor of Wells until his death on September 1, 1497. He must have been a distinguished singer and organist, for he is commemorated in two Latin epitaphs by Blessed Thomas More, who knew him. In the short article on Abyndon in Grove's 'Dictionary of Music and Musicians' (new edition, vol. i., p. 8) it is stated that More's friendship for the musician 'is evidence of Abyndon's ability and goodness,' but it is added that 'the acquaintance can only have been slight, as More was but seventeen when Abyndon died.' This latter statement is a slip on the part of Sir George Grove, for More was born on Saturday, February 7, 1477-78; he was consequently in his twentieth year at the time of Abyndon's death, and was a law-student of considerable promise, as well as a good singer.

More's two Latin epitaphs on the deceased musician have been several times printed. In one of them occurs the following couplet:

'Millibus in mille cantor fuit optimus ille,
Praeter et haec ista fuit optimus orgaquenista.'

Rimbault quotes the English epitaph on Abyndon from Stanihurst, but he remarks that it is merely an adaptation from More. Stanihurst was a distinguished Irishman, and is aptly described by Camden as: 'Eruditissimus ille nobilis Richardus Stanihurstus.' He was born in Dublin in 1545, and graduated at Oxford, becoming a barrister at Lincoln's Inn. His first work, published in London in 1570, was Harmonia seu catena dialectica Porphyrium. However, his 'poetical conceits' in Latin and English did not appear till 1583, at which date he was living in exile as a Catholic priest, and Chaplain to Albert, Archduke of Austria, dying at Brussels in 1618.

Church and Organ Music.

EXTEMPORIZATION BY THE CHURCH ORGANIST.

The Royal College of Organists most wisely includes, in its tests for the Fellowship Diploma, the important subject of Extemporization upon a given theme. But, in spite of this, the serious cultivation of the art by those to whom it is of the greatest value can hardly be said to have reached the level of excellence it deserves. The reason for this may possibly be found in the diffidence with which so many organists are prone to regard their powers. They may be, and generally are, ready enough in their performance of difficult works; they may also be good accompanists, and excellent in their management of the organ. And yet, when they are asked to extemporize, say, a voluntary before service, they seem to fall into a stereotyped manner, wholly devoid of interest, either in thematic material or its development. The too common reply to the question 'Do you extemporize?' is an apologetic 'No; I don't do much in that way.' Surely, everyone aspiring to the high calling of a Church organist should regard extemporization as an essential part of his equipment. It may be said at once that few approach the subject from the right direction. There are, of course, many examples of natural aptitude in those who have had little or no musical training, but it is equally true that this delightful and necessary accomplishment may be acquired to some considerable extent by the less gifted, if they are content to study the question first in its simpler aspects.

Before everything, a knowledge of the rules of harmony is essential, but as this is now possessed so generally, it is assumed that sufficient has been learned to enable the student to 'write' correct four-part harmony. In its advanced stages, extemporizing demands the greatest freedom as to the number of parts employed, as is the case in advanced written composition. But the object of this paper is to consider the elementary principles underlying the art. Let an attempt be made to improvise simple passages in three parts, for the moment disregarding rhythm and even time. The object should be to become accustomed to see quickly the proper movement of each part, e.g.:

Then, when progress in these matters has been made, a step would be gained by endeavouring to convey a sense of time and rhythm to this simple passage, as follows:

But further consideration will show some possible points of imitation:

These are, indeed, childish ideas; but until the principles underlying them are mastered, proficiency will be impossible. Similar examples may be practised in four, and eventually five or more parts.

It is a strange fact that if ten organists are asked to extemporize upon such a subject as the following:

nine of them will be content to commence by simply harmonizing it. But if examined, several points will be noticed of which use can be made. In most themes there will be found features of melodic or rhythmic interest, and the student is advised to regard the theme, whether his own or one suggested to him, as so much material upon which he is to work. An examination of the works of great composers will reveal their methods of development; and though it is much to say that extemporizing, if it is to be of value, should be equal to a written work, the principles of the latter should apply in some degree to unpremeditated examples.

In the simple subject last given, two points suggest themselves, viz., the rhythmic movement of the first four notes, and the melodic progression of the last three. In employing the first of these, the note-values are most important, and any variation of actual 'sounds' may be made, so long as they are governed by the former. For example, a beginning might be made as follows:

by way of introduction. Then the theme might be stated with suitable harmony, in which rhythmic imitation might be introduced, followed by a parallel phrase on other notes. Then would come a modulation to, say, the relative major, followed by the employment of more remote keys, still maintaining the character of the theme. The last three notes of this might be used in many ways, so long as they govern the general appearance of the development. The following at once suggests itself:

and would be of help in modulation. The two ideas might be combined:

By following these primitive ideas the student will find the work engrossing in its interest, and his alertness in grasping the possibilities of a simple theme immensely increased. He is advised to practise with a theme before him, and later should endeavour to commit it to memory.

The introductory voluntary affords an excellent opportunity to the organist, and much depends upon his artistic resources when they are employed in preparing his listeners for the service to which his voluntary is but the prelude.

The time has surely gone by when the following may be considered a fitting introduction to a musical service :

Tempo decidedly rubato!

Man. { Gt. Diap.

Ped. { 16 ft. Ped. Gt. to Ped.

open Sw. rapidly.

Why do so many organists make it an invariable rule to commence with a pedal-note? And why does the left-hand maintain the respectful distance of an octave above the pedals? The result is of course that there are three distinct basses, viz., the 16-ft. pedal, the 8-ft. by means of the coupler, and the octave above by the left-hand. There are, no doubt, many occasions when the pedals might enter first with good effect; but it is equally important to employ other parts in as prominent a manner. Assiduous practice in making contrapuntal entries of the various parts will give wonderful freedom, and suggest all sorts of development, even of the simplest theme.

SPECIAL SERVICES.

On May 16, the annual oratorio services took place in Ely Cathedral. The morning service included Bach's 'A stronghold sure,' and Beethoven's Symphony in C minor. In the afternoon were performed Parry's 'Blest pair of sirens,' and Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of praise.' The choir of 200 voices was drawn from Ely, Cambridge, Huntingdon, and Newmarket. The orchestra, which was largely professional, was led by Mr. Haydn Inwards. The soloists were Miss Viola Salvin, Miss Florence Atkin, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. Wykes. Mr. E. A. Davison was at the organ, and Mr. J. F. Chubb at the pianoforte. Dr. A. W. Wilson conducted.

On Palm Sunday an impressive performance of Cuthbert Nunn's 'Via Dolorosa' was given in the Baptist Chapel, Quorn, under the direction of the organist, Mr. H. H. North. Mr. C. Sutton, of Loughboro' Parish Church, capably sustained the important solo part entrusted to him, and the singing of the choir was marked by correct intonation, and the subdued solemnity which the work calls for.

Through the liberality of a resident, a performance of Handel's 'Israel in Egypt' was given at Gilmorton on May 14. The choruses were well rendered by a choir of fifty voices, while the soloists were Miss Daisy Pearson, Miss Edith Colman, Mr. Hector Dams, and Messrs. A. G. Colledge and J. Nicholls. A band of strings, trumpets, and drums was supplemented by the organ, at which Mr. F. Vallance presided. Mr. H. Matthews conducted.

On the evening of Good Friday, Arthur Somervell's 'The seven last words' was sung in St. John's Cathedral, Newfoundland, in the presence of a large congregation. The Cathedral organist, Mr. C. H. Allen, was at the organ, and played as voluntaries Choral Preludes by Bach and Brahms.

A programme of oratorio selections was performed by the choir of St. Matthew's Church, Toronto, with an orchestra, on April 12, under the direction of Mr. A. E. Redsell.

At an At Home given by Mrs. Lett, of 8, Lower Berkeley Street, London, the Rev. J. Eckersley, Vicar of Langley, gave an address in explanation of a new method of rendering the Psalms. Several Psalms were sung by a choir as illustrations.

The organ of All Saints' Church, Bradford, was re-opened after renovation on May 24, when Mr. Charles Scott gave a recital.

The new organ in St. Mary's Church, Birkenhead, was opened by Mr. Alfred Hollins on April 27.

THE LONDON MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

Owing to the late period of the month in which the London Musical Festival fell, we are able to deal with it here no further than the concert of Wednesday evening, May 24, at which Elgar's new Symphony in E flat was performed for the first time. As this was fully analysed in our columns last month, detailed description of its contents is unnecessary here. It fully bore out the anticipation that, as a whole, it would prove brighter and less strenuous in character than its predecessors. In the new work the emotion runs more placidly and evenly, though there are many moments of intense feeling and one or two tornado-like outbursts. While never ceasing to bear Elgar's characteristic signature, the music takes us into fields of thought that the composer has not touched upon before. This is especially so in the extremely fanciful Scherzo and the solemn slow movement. The Symphony generally suggests a mind that has lived through many illusions and disappointments, and found the deeper peace of things. There is an exquisite refinement in the exhilaration of the first and last movements, and a peculiar nobility in the thematic fragment, derived from one of the motives of the opening Allegro, that is so frequently used as a kind of philosophic summing-up of all that has gone before. The orchestration presents many new and interesting features. The Symphony received an extremely good first performance, though certain of the details of the score may be expected to come out more clearly later on. It was enthusiastically received, the composer being frequently recalled.

A deep impression was made also by Mr. Granville Bantock's symphonic poem 'Dante and Beatrice,' a rich expression of the characteristically full-blooded emotion of that composer. Here again the scoring is of exceptional originality and beauty; one can hardly imagine a more gorgeous flood of tone than that poured out by the orchestra at times. At a first hearing, the solo cadenzas that introduce the Beatrice music may not quite justify themselves, but perhaps the psychological reason for them may become clearer as we know the work better. The themes of the symphonic poem are very striking,—that of Beatrice being especially beautiful—and they are developed with greater closeness of texture than in any previous orchestral work by Mr. Bantock. The two other English novelties were of a slighter cast. Dr. Walford Davies's little suite 'Parthenia' is somewhat heterogeneous in style; part of it is purely and delightfully English, with the dewy freshness that is characteristic of so much of Dr. Davies's music; other parts seem to have come direct from 'Tristan.' All the music is good in itself, though the various styles do not blend. Mr. Percy Pitt's 'English Rhapsody' is a clever jeu d'esprit, quite English in that it is founded on old English melodies, and quite rhapsodical in its haphazard treatment of them.

The solo performances were of high quality throughout. Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Casals, each at his best, and each stimulated by the other, gave a reading of Brahms's double Concerto for violin and violoncello that made this noble work live in every phrase. Mr. Kreisler was as splendid as ever in the Elgar Violin concerto, and Mr. Casals played the D major Violoncello concerto of Haydn as probably only he can play it, with incomparable grace, tenderness and humour. Madame Julia Culp's singing of the Angel's music in 'The dream of Gerontius' was magnificent in itself, but not precisely angelic. Her tremendous temperament kept forcing itself through the music at one point after another; and though she made some thrilling emotional effects, one felt them to be a little out of key with one's notion of the pitying but passionless being whom Newman and Elgar have drawn for us. In her selections at a later concert,—Monteverde's amazingly modern 'Lamento d'Arianna' and two songs by Schubert—Madame Culp could give free wing to her temperament without danger to the music; and her singing throughout was that of an exceptionally fine artist.

Two works, though not actually new, were given on May 22 and 23 respectively for the first time in England. Max Reger's setting of the '100th Psalm' is a tough nut for a general audience to crack, while musicians as a whole will probably respect it more than love it. Its rich and deftly-wrought counterpoint make it a pleasure to read, but in performance the work is heavy and wearisome, partly on account of Reger's inability to give his counterpoint any rhythmical interest. And as if the choral writing itself were not perilously thick and involved, Reger must needs becloud it further with some very judicious orchestration. Debussy's 'Rondes de Printemps' (the third of a new set of 'Images') went to the other extreme of style. Max Reger is obscure through sheer over-statement, Debussy through excessive reticence. His aim is to paint certain of the more elusive aspects of nature; the misfortune is that the musical symbol is generally so abstract and so remote from the thing symbolised, that we cannot see any connection between the two. At a first hearing, at any rate, the work must be pronounced mostly unintelligible, though there are passages in it of which the beauty makes an immediate appeal.

The Norwich Festival choir sang in 'The dream of Gerontius' and the '100th Psalm.' It hardly came up to expectations; perhaps the strain of travelling and of rehearsal had told upon the singers before they came on the platform. The semi-chorus in 'Gerontius,' however, was excellent.

Reviews.

The Form and Order of the Service to be performed at the Coronation of Their Majesties King George V. and Queen Mary. Edited by Sir Frederick Bridge.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Though not altogether unique, the experience of acting as Director of the Music at two Coronations has fallen to the lot of few. We believe Sir George Smart acted in that capacity on three such occasions. But the rapid advance of musical culture both by composers and performers has rendered Sir Frederick Bridge's task a far greater one than ever. That he has succeeded in providing an entirely adequate scheme for the great event to which all are looking forward, no one will deny. He has selected works which may be taken as representing no fewer than five centuries. For pure unaccompanied singing Tallis's Litany is a fine example, to which may be added Gibbons's Amen, and in more modern fashion that by Sir John Stainer. Of the larger works four should be mentioned, viz.: Sir Hubert Parry's 'Te Deum' and his anthem 'I was glad,' Sir Frederick Bridge's 'Homage Anthem,' and Sir Charles Stanford's setting of the 'Gloria in Excelsis.' In his preface to the Coronation Service Book, Dr. Alcock says of the Te Deum, 'the broad lines in which it is cast, with the elaboration of figure and development, combine to render the setting a real achievement.' The use made by the composer of three principal themes ('St. Ann's' tune, the 'Old hundredth,' and the Intonation to the Creed) is sufficient support for this contention. The anthem 'I was glad,' which was specially composed for the coronation of King Edward, is fortunately to be repeated, with, of course, some slight alteration of the middle section containing the acclamations by the Westminster scholars. The orchestral introduction is also new, which, possibly from old associations, we cannot help regretting, fine as the new section undoubtedly is. It may be hoped that the anthem will be generally used, for the subject is suitable for many seasons of the Church's year, and the nobility of the music, its lofty conception and the knowledge of effect it exhibits, make it a notable addition to our repertoire of sacred music. It should be added that the middle section containing the 'Vivats' can be omitted.

Sir Frederick Bridge's 'Homage Anthem' well illustrates the employment of simple means for the securing of great effect. The composer has no doubt kept in mind the circumstances under which his music will be heard, and we do not question the result. The use of the chorale 'Ein feste Burg' was a happy idea, and could only ensure that stately and powerful appeal which the occasion demands. The choice of words is of equal importance, and the use of the Bible version has secured a stronger interest than that conveyed by the Prayer-book version. Sir Frederick's anthem will no doubt find a wide acceptance.

In his setting of the 'Gloria in Excelsis,' (in B flat) Sir Charles Stanford again shows that consummate mastery of detail and technique which characterizes all his church music. In the thematic material, no less than the working out, he has produced a work which is not only entirely worthy of the occasion which called it forth, but which may well rank with his best achievements of the same character.

The remaining new works comprise Sir Edward Elgar's 'Offertorium' and the 'Sanctus' by Dr. W. G. Alcock. The former is characterized, as the preface truly points out, by 'that spiritual intensity' which is so conspicuous in the composer's work, and 'is exactly what it should be—a reverent supplication.' The 'Sanctus,' while on simple lines, contains material of sufficient interest for so short a work, the chief effects being obtained by a passage of modulation at the words 'Heaven and earth,' and the 'fanfare' introducing an enharmonic change which leads naturally enough to the conclusion in A major.

Sir Frederick Bridge has adapted the exquisite music of Purcell to the words of the Introit, 'Let my prayer, and their mutual suitability more than justifies. Sir Walter Parratt's Confortare, 'Be strong, and play the man,' is again included in the scheme, and with every good reason, for it exactly suits the occasion and the moment. Handel's

'Zadok' needs no description, but it may be said that it has claimed a place at every coronation since that of George II. and Queen Caroline, for which Handel indeed composed it, and has thus proved its worth.

Sir George Martin has enriched John Merbecke's venerable Creed with an accompaniment for brass and organ, which shows his command of the resources of those instruments no less than his reverence for tradition.

The whole selection is worthy of the great ceremony at which it will be used.

Those haunting eyes. Fountain song. By Ernest Austin.
[J. H. Larway.]

In these songs we find perfect agreement between poet and composer, for not only are they one and the same person, but Ernest Austin the composer shows singular adaptability and sensibility to the rhythm and sentiments of Ernest Austin the poet, for he unmercifully breaks up the continuity and balance of his musical phrases to give full weight of accentuation and expression to the verbal phrases. It is a method he has always favoured and often practised, and in the present instance he certainly employs it with confidence and effect. In 'Those haunting eyes' there are time-signatures to indicate the changes, but that antiquated device is ignored in 'Fountain song,' where even the bars are inserted, as if apologetically, with dotted lines. The former song is agreeably sentimental and the latter is dainty. Their musical ideas, if below the level of Mr. Austin's best inspirations, are at least interesting and out of the common rut.

Summer Sketches. For the Organ. By Edwin H. Lemare.
[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

This very attractive work consists of a suite of five short movements, obviously intended for performance in their printed order, viz., 'Dawn,' 'The Bee,' 'Cuckoo,' 'Twilight,' 'Evening.' The first three are suitable, however, as separate numbers. Mr. Lemare's knowledge of organ registration and its possibilities is well known, and he exhibits that knowledge most happily. An organ of modern construction, possessing at least three manuals, is necessary if the pieces are to make their effect, while some demand is made upon the technical resources and musical intelligence of the performer. But these are becoming more general, and the Suite will, we believe, be very widely used by those to whom music in this free, and none the less attractive, style makes an appeal.

The effect of increasing brightness and movement in 'Dawn' is exceedingly well obtained, and the droning of the bee is faithfully suggested in the second number. Of the remaining movements we particularly like, 'Evening,' for its peaceful character and dreamy atmosphere, which come as the natural consequence of the movement preceding it.

Ich möchte weinen. By Willy Lehmann.
[Breitkopf & Härtel.]

This is a setting of Heine's sonnet 'Ich möchte weinen, doch ich kann es nicht.' An English version is added, of which 'to the base earth must I cling, where foul and hissing wormbrood round me creep, foul wormbrood round me creep' is perhaps not the best specimen sentence. The composer yearns to be deeply expressive, and the melodic contours and choral progressions are moulded with this object in view; but mere yearning does not bring its attainment. For all its Wagnerian harmonies, its seriousness, its artistic design and finish, the song does not carry conviction, although it is capable of picturesque effect when sung with orchestra. Some marks on the pianoforte score indicate that the accompaniment was originally conceived as orchestral music.

TENORS AND VOICE-FAILURE.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—A statement by Signor Caruso has lately appeared in the daily press to the effect that, owing to some unexplained trouble with his throat, he is compelled to cancel all his engagements, and relinquish singing for a period, which he anticipates will extend over a good many months. May I venture to hope that this announcement of sudden voice-failure, coming from a singer of such world-wide renown, will induce some of our leading musicians to inquire into a matter which urgently calls for investigation?

Sudden deprivation of the singing voice, which is not the result of cold, and which the sufferer cannot account for in any other way, is a thing which is continually happening to tenor singers; but the musical world is probably not aware how common is the misfortune, because it is only in the case of those who have established a reputation that the circumstance obtains a sufficiently wide publicity. I have frequently, though not very successfully, endeavoured to draw attention to this mysterious failure of voice, to which tenors appear to be peculiarly liable. Perhaps, Sir, you will permit me to refer once more to the matter, and to state what I have long been convinced is the true cause of the evil.

The premature decay of voice so common among tenor singers is, I believe, a natural result of the mistaken but almost universal supposition that the voice of a man is necessarily produced in an essentially different way from that of a woman or a boy. The adult male singer is taught to use a certain kind of voice, termed chest voice, for either the whole or nearly the whole of his vocal compass, while the female singer is forbidden to employ this kind of voice except for comparatively few of her low notes. Now the fact, which, strange to say, seems to be unknown both to the vocal physiologist and to the practical musician, is that there are two kinds of chest voice, obtained in two fundamentally different ways. There is the chest voice which is the lower of two separate registers, and there is the chest voice which extends throughout the whole of the vocal compass and is the only kind of voice which its owner possesses. The former kind, though in many cases a very useful voice for ordinary purposes, is always more or less wrongly produced, and cannot with safety be employed freely except at a somewhat low pitch. The other kind of chest voice, which is similar in point of robustness but very superior in quality, is produced, as I think can very clearly be proved, in precisely the same way as the middle and upper part of a well-trained soprano voice.

In the case of the best tenor singers, the voice before it is trained is of this latter description; but since the various approved methods of training are all based upon the erroneous supposition above mentioned, the result of the training process is slowly but surely to alter the mode of production originally prompted by nature. The immediate effect of this alteration is deceptive. The would-be singer finds that he gets a louder tone out of his voice than formerly, and therefore thinks that he is strengthening and developing it. Only, perhaps, after he has been for some years before the public does he begin to realise that he is singing with much more effort than he once did, and that his voice is gradually deteriorating. Later comes the inevitable break-down, when, as in the case of the great singer referred to, a prolonged period of rest is rendered compulsory, while in not a few instances a promising career is brought summarily to an end.—Yours faithfully,

ELLIOTT FUND.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Some two years ago you were good enough to publish an appeal which I then made on behalf of this Fund, the object of which is to provide a small pension for Mr. J. W. Elliott, for many years organist of St. Mark's Church, Hamilton Terrace, N.W., and the composer of several of our best-known hymn tunes. I am glad to say that in response to that appeal, together with assistance which I have received from several of the present and past members of the congregation of St. Mark's Church, I have so far been able to hand to Mr. Elliott each quarter an amount equivalent to the salary he was accustomed to receive from the Church. In order to continue this most necessary work I have now to make a further appeal for support, and whilst thanking those of your readers who have so kindly assisted in the past, may I ask them to be good enough to renew their donations so far as possible.

I should like to add that there are no expenses whatever in connection with this Fund, and that I shall be most happy at any time to forward full particulars to any interested, on receipt of a post-card with name and address.—I am, Sir, Yours faithfully,

F. J. WALKER,

Hon. Treasurer 'Elliott Fund.'

Obituary.

Deep regret will be felt among musicians of all countries at the death of GUSTAV MAHLER, which occurred at Vienna on May 18. He was born at Kallocht, in Bohemia, on July 7, 1860, and studied at Iglau, Prague, and at Vienna University. A succession of musical appointments of increasing importance culminated in his instalment in 1897 as Director of the Court Opera at Vienna. He also succeeded Dr. Richter as conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic concerts. Since 1907 he had been living in New York, where he was musical director at the Opera House and afterwards conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. Although Mahler was one of the foremost musicians of his day, he was little known to the public in England. Two of his symphonies have been performed at the Queen's Hall, London, Promenade concerts, but they failed to win popularity. The English public were apathetic to his music probably because his naïveté of expression did not stir them and his high endeavour and scholarship, although doubtless admired, made no deep appeal; in the case of the symphonies a further obstacle to acceptance was their length. Mahler wrote in all eight symphonies, the last of which employs a choir for the singing of the 'Veni Creator Spiritus' and a portion of Goethe's 'Faust.' His other works include 'Humoresken' for orchestra and a cantata 'Das Klagende Lied.' As a conductor he was universally considered one of the greatest of his generation.

We regret to record the death, at Ladysmith, South Africa, on April 5, of ARTHUR W. SMITH, F.R.C.O., A.R.C.M., organist of the War Memorial Church, the son of Samuel Smith, of Windsor.

At the Royal Academy of Music, the Charles Mortimer Prize (composition) has been awarded to Douglas F. W. St. Leger (Madras), Alma Goatley being highly commended. The Louisa Hopkins Memorial Prize (pianoforte) has been awarded to Elsie Jones (Coves, Isle of Wight), Katherine Doubleday being commended. The Thomas Threlfall Scholarship (for organ playing) has been awarded to Hubert S. Middleton (Windsor).

Lectures were delivered before the Musical Association on April 25, by Mr. Herbert Antcliffe on 'The sense of programme' and on May 16, by Mr. E. Howard Jones, on 'Brahms in his pianoforte-music.'

SCENE 2: Meeting of the Old World and the New.—The music here is founded on various works of Byrd, Gibbons, Pilkington, and Rossiter.

SCENE 3: Charles I., has nothing new. A 'Pastoral dance' by Edward German and some old music of Dowland suffices. A notable effect is gained with the simplest of means at the King's execution.

SCENE 4: (A.) Charles II.: The Restoration.—The music here is founded on the song 'Old Sir Simon the King.'

(B.) The Plague of London.—Here and in the next two episodes we have samples of Mr. Balfour Gardiner's powers; the 'Plague music' is appropriately lugubrious, commencing with this powerful discord:

while in—

(C.) The Fire of London, we have some unusual effects of chromatic scales in complete chords, which seem very daring for military band. But Mr. Gardiner writes with absolute assurance. He is heard to full advantage in episode—

(D.) The Lord Mayor's Show; and there is a 'Clothworkers' song.

SCENE 5: George II.—Here Handel's 'Dettingen Te Deum' and 'Dead March' in 'Saul' are utilised.

SCENE 6: St. Bartholomew's Fair.—The music to this scene comprises some very gay dances by Mr. Frederic Austin.

SCENE 7: The End of the Great War.—The music is arranged from contemporary sources. All that follows (excepting the concluding 'Masque') is at the time of writing not definitely settled.

PART IV.

This is an addition to the original scheme. It was intended to have a series of Colonial scenes, each with music provided by a native composer; but this has not proved practicable. At present only two episodes are settled.

SCENE 1: Newfoundland.—The music is by Mr. A. Allen, the organist of St. John's Cathedral, and introduces a choral ode, 'Newfoundland.'

SCENE 2: Australia.—(Uncertain.)

SCENE 3: New Zealand.—A native composer of great promise, Mr. Arthur Alexander, who is still a student at the Royal Academy of Music, has written a powerful 'March,' an incidental piece, and a quaint 'Maori dance.'

SCENE 4: South Africa.—(Uncertain.)

SCENE 5: Canada.—(Uncertain.)

SCENE 6: India.—(Not yet settled.)

THE MASQUE IMPERIAL.

When the Pageant was being prepared last year, it was arranged that it should conclude with a poetic and allegorical 'Masque.' This was accordingly written by Mr. Francis H. Markoe. About two months before the intended production, it was suddenly discovered that the music had been forgotten. Several composers were hastily appealed to, but all declined the heavy task of dashing off so huge a score in five weeks. In this dilemma Mr. Bell applied to Mr. F. Corder, who at once accepted and fulfilled the commission.

The 'Masque Imperial' commences with a fine Overture, in obedience to the stage directions, which say:

'After a little the world becomes audible. The hum of insects, the thin song of birds, the whisper-swaying of leaves, the sound-silences of running waters, a myriad vocal mysteries, and beneath them all the deep, ceaseless bourdon of Ocean.'

In plain English, there is a mysterious Introduction in which the musical subjects struggle towards clear expression, which they presently achieve in a curious pastoral movement, in the unusual time of  $\frac{1}{8}$ . The second subject is a long melody of a strange, haunting character, oddly syncopated and beginning:

The 'Genius of the World' then appears, introducing himself with the somewhat grotesque lines:

'Genius Mundi sum;
Out of her heart I come.'

After a lengthy speech he proceeds to summon the 'Seven Queens of Destiny,' and the choir, representing the 'Voices of the World,' utter an impressive invocation. 'Then,' says the book, 'gradually they detach themselves from the rock seven forms of women, infinitely old, and with horns upon their foreheads.' They have some curious music, chiefly in augmented triads. The Genius next summons Britannia, whose coming should be the sensation of the whole work. She is greeted and ferried across the lake by her attendant Spirits of Meadow and Forest, of Lake and Stream, of Sky and Mist, of Cliff and Mountain, and of Ocean. Each group has its special section in a chain of short choruses, the first of which, sung by boys' voices, has a tune which the audience will probably go home humming:

The attendants are dismissed, to a reprise of their choruses, and the oldest of the Seven Queens lectures Britannia at length upon her duty to the world. She is confronted—a pretty, pathetic touch—with bands of the weary people who have given their lives for their country without reward. Slight pieces of melodrama here accompany the speeches, appropriate in character, it need hardly be said. After various trials the Queen says:

'Nobly, Britannia, have you proved your worth
To rank among the glorious ones of earth,
And having metamorphosized (sic) its pain,
Behold, triumphant, the Imperial Gain!'

'Now suddenly from all sides shall sound forth peal after peal of silver trumpets; no longer are the 'Damoels of Death' dark and dreadful, but resplendent and beautiful; no longer are the seven 'Need Queens' old, but young and glorious; no longer are the bands of people weary and wishful, but happy and triumphant.

'Then in the distance, wending nearer appears—

'THE PAGEANT OF THE GAIN OF EMPIRE.'

This is a truly marvellous procession, and the music rises to the occasion. The tune of 'Rule, Britannia!' which has been hinted at in the preceding music, here gathers shape, first as a double fugue:

which merges into a stately and swinging March. This has two subjects, which work together, a Trio suggesting barbaric music, and a Coda, in which Arne's tune is found to form a bass to the second subject of the march. These technical achievements are effected with no apparent effort, being merely thrown in, as it were, to heighten the climax.

The procession at last moves off into a temple, whence come the sounds of an anthem and Tallis's Responses. The 'Genius of the World' is left as a solitary kneeling figure, and all fades away. So ends a work on which for the instruction of the people many scores of thousands of pounds have been lavished, and which has given an opportunity for seventeen of our many able musicians to distinguish themselves. That they have proved equal to the occasion will, we think, be undeniable. It may be mentioned that about a dozen other composers were invited to contribute, but were for various reasons unable to do so.

SHEFFIELD MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

The sixth triennial Festival of the Yorkshire cutlery capital was held in the Albert Hall, Sheffield, on April 26, 27 and 28. The good people of Sheffield are nothing if not startling, and when they are not surprising the world with their choral deeds they are determined to do something else out of the common. Six years ago they secured Mr. Felix Weingartner to conduct their Cutlers' Festival of Music, and incidentally furnish some surprising interpretations of Bach and Berlioz. Three years ago, with Sir Henry Wood once more in command, it was a novel scheme of sandwiched rehearsals and concerts which provided the attraction—an excellent and wholesome plan which Cardiff has since followed, though the 'box office' reported unfavourably on the innovation. This year, the new idea was to hold the Festival, not, as formerly, in October, but in April, owing to Sir Henry Wood and his Orchestra not being available in the Autumn. The experiment, however, proved expensive, for at no concert was the Hall full, despite the invitation of a well-chosen programme. There were several other new features, and one or two sensations, which will be duly recorded.

To begin with, for the first time in the history of any first-class British festival, every bar of music sung and played was prepared and conducted by one man—Sir Henry Wood. The resignation of Dr. Coward opened the way for the realization of an old ambition of the Queen's Hall director: to rehearse from A to Z, and conduct throughout, a great English festival. He was appointed to the dual post and took over the work with characteristic thoroughness. He engaged apartments in the city, and for nearly a year, on two nights a week, sometimes three, he drilled the choir, first with sectional and, later on, with full pianoforte rehearsals. Nearly a hundred of these were held, the chief labouring with incredible industry and the choir supporting him in whole-hearted enthusiasm.

The fruits were revealed in the wonderful technical finish of the singing, and the unity of idea and style which permeated everything that was done at the recent Festival. Right or wrong—and the interpretations have been sharply criticised—they were phenomenal exhibitions of organized ensemble, and a plastic, unified, almost hypnotised, collective mind, contributed to by nearly 400 persons, swayed mentally as well as musically by the dominating will of their teacher and master.

With the first performance—'The Messiah'—on the morning of April 26, the sensations were begun. Never, surely, has such a 'Messiah' been heard at a British festival! The conductor set traditions and metronome marks aside, and gave a new reading, bristling with innovations as revolutionary as, in certain instances, they were superficially effective. The solos were left pretty much according to usage, save that the speed of 'Rejoice greatly' taxed to the utmost the skill of even so flexible a singer as Madame Agnes Nicholls. The choruses, however, were made highly 'impressionistic.' There was not a page but had its impress of emotional nuances, strong accents, intensified diction, mobile tempo and give-and-take part-singing. One may and one does object to the distortion of the 'Hallelujah' chorus, the pointless dynamic excrescences of 'For unto us,' the extremely rapid tempo of 'And the Glory,' 'All we like sheep,' and the closing portion of 'Lift up your heads.' But on the other hand the performance was in many places vitalised into lucid, convincing beauty and force by the illuminating ideas of the conductor. The dramatic poise of 'He trusted in God' was secured to a nicety, and the slow closing section of 'All we like sheep' was an overwhelming recital in tone of the tragedy and poignancy of the Atonement. To come to mere technical matters, the diction of the choir was almost miraculous and has never in my experience been equalled by any other English festival choir, while the precision and sensitive modelling of the expression was a triumph of discipline. The soloists were Madame Agnes Nicholls, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Ben Davies (who sang very expressively in the Passion music), and Mr. Frederic Austin.

At the evening concert there was produced for the first time in England Professor Georg Schumann's Biblical cantata, 'Ruth.' The work is laid out for soprano, contralto, baritone and bass soli, a large orchestra and chorus. Following a brief orchestral introduction, there are six scenes respectively named 'Naomi's Lament,' 'The return of Ruth and Naomi to Jerusalem,' 'In the harvest-field,' 'Naomi's counsel,' 'In the threshing-floor,' and 'Morning dawn.' These, broadly, coincide with the main incidents of the Bible narrative. But for cantata purposes, certain of the incidents have been amplified, not always with good judgment or authentic justification. The 'Return to Jerusalem' scene is made ferociously dramatic, and contains a remarkable chain of declamatory fugato choruses of exceptional difficulty, but ending in a quiet solo for Ruth of pleasant though rather obvious melodiousness. The 'Harvest-field' music is frankly secular. Though thematic coincidences abound, the music is of considerable charm, grateful to sing and scored with complete mastery of technique. The 'Threshing-floor' scene is preluded by an interpolated 'Chorus of nocturnal spirits,' who flutter round the fearful Ruth and jeer at her mission and fears in vivacious strains. Then ensues a love-scene of Gounod-like mellifluousness, followed by an imposing 'Morning hymn of the Priests'—a finely-written chorus; and the whole ends in Wagner's most gorgeous 'Tristan' manner, with a brilliant peroration.

The weakness of 'Ruth' is its lack of distinctive style. Only occasionally does the composer speak with an individual utterance: almost constantly he is using the formulas and idioms of others. It is only here and there, as in the extremely clever and finely marshalled riotous music of the populace and in the later love-music, that he is self-reliant. He is an expert craftsman, equipped with all the tricks and technique of his work. 'Ruth' is a fascinating composition for the average concert audience. The solos are of agreeable interest, save the opening 'Naomi's Lament,' a tedious, ineffective stretch of pseudo-intense Wagnerian declamation. The soloists were Madame Agnes Nicholls, Madame Kirkby Lunn, Mr. Thorpe Bates, and Mr. Robert Radford, all of whom sang with point and enthusiasm. The chorus-singing represented the last word in precision, clarity of diction, versatility of impersonation and widely-graded expressiveness. One of the Reapers' choruses (ladies' voices) was full of exquisite comedy, to the charm of all present.

The programme also included Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole,' for violin and orchestra, the solo part being played with infinite abandon by Mr. Jacques Thibaud; and Strauss's tone-poem 'Don Juan,' gloriously interpreted by the orchestra.

The following morning, April 27, found the choir faced with their supreme task of the Festival. Bach's Mass in B minor, is the ultimate test of the staying-power, technique and brains of a choir. Sir Henry Wood had made it the battle-horse of the Festival. He had issued exhaustive booklets of minute instructions to each of the singers, and had taken infinite pains over the correct vowel definition of the Latin text and the proper emotional impulse behind every phrase. Another matter on which he was insistent was the securing of a nicely estimated perspective in fugal or imitative passages. As a result the part-singing was as sensitive and differentiated as are the thematic and counterpoint lines of a well-played fugue from the 'Well-tempered Clavier.' The opening 'Kyrie Eleison' was in these matters a triumph of discipline and reticence. There was some regrettable flattening in the 'Et Incarnatus' and the 'Crucifixus': the latter was taken much more loudly than is customary. The conductor thrashed his choir into a prestissimo in the succeeding 'Et Resurrexit'; on and on he pressed them, to the complete loss of all the elaborate detail of the contrapuntal tissue: yet the total effect of this and the 'Cum Sancto Spiritu,' taken equally rapidly, was, in a way, exhilarating in its torrential rush of exultant outpouring of song. Only a supremely clever choir, trained with special attention to flexibility, could have emerged safely from such a test of virtuosity. With a mention of the total sublimity of the 'Sanctus' and a word of appreciation of the exquisite accompaniments by the orchestra, I must proceed to other records. The solos were in the safe care of Madame Agnes Nicholls, Miss Ellen Beck, Mr. Alfred Heather, Mr. Thorpe Bates, and Mr. Robert Radford. The obligato to the 'Quoniam tu solus' was played on a specially made corno da caccia by Mr. A. E. Brain, junr.

The evening concert furnished the most refined chorus-singing of the Festival in Brahms's 'Song of Destiny.' The moods of the music were fully realised, and we heard in the opening section some vocal tone that for refined beauty would be hard to surpass. The closing scene from each music-drama of the 'Ring' tetralogy was a well-intentioned selection, but owing to the unsuitability of some of the principals, the excerpts did not make their full effect, gloriously as the orchestra played. Neither Miss Edith Evans nor Mr. Ben Davies were well-sited in the long scene which closes 'Siegfried,' and Miss Evans, though she sang conscientiously and with point, was somewhat over-weighted by the 'Götterdämmerung' music. The other scenes were more satisfactory. The soloists were Mr. Robert Radford, Mr. Herbert Brown, Mr. Thorpe Bates, Miss Eva Rich, Mrs. J. A. Rodgers, Miss Amy Skerritt, and Mrs. J. W. Ibberson. The orchestra gave beautifully finished performances of Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony and Beethoven's 'Coriolan' Overture.

The second Bach revival of the Festival took place on the following morning. In its general features the performance was largely a replica of that of three years ago, which at the time attracted much attention and was freely discussed. Sir Henry Wood approaches the 'Passion' from an entirely different emotional standpoint from that of Sir Charles Stanford, whose recent interpretation at the Leeds Festival of last October provokes the comparison.

The younger musician impresses upon the music his own warmer temperament, erring probably in the direction of exuberance of expression as the other musician does in austerity and reticence. Once, however, Sir Henry Wood's point of view was accepted there could be nothing but admiration for the strictly musical qualities of the performance. The choir sang with intense devotion in the Chorales, as well as in the dramatic and reflective choruses. The music of the Narrator was entrusted, as at Leeds, to Mr. Gervase Elwes, who applied all his finished art to the utterance of the moving story. Mr. Frederick Ranaflow was impressive in voice and style in the music of Christ. A judiciously chosen list of soloists included Miss Eva Rich, Madame Edna Thornton, Mr. Herbert Brown, Mr. Robert Radford, Miss Amy Skerritt, Mr. William Burrows, and Mr. Joseph Lycett. The pianoforte was dispensed with in the continuo, the part being played on the organ, as before, by Mr. J. W. Phillips. The solo instruments were played (very beautifully) by Messrs. Jacques Renard (viola da gamba); Maurice Sons (violin); De Busscher, Dubrucq (oboi d'amore); McDonagh, Stanislaus (oboi di caccia); A. Fransella (flute).

The final concert opened with a performance of Professor Bantock's 'Omar Khayyam' (Part I.) which, on its orchestral side, was brilliant and full of finely graded nuances of expression, though the strings were not numerically sufficient for correct balance. The choir once more sang with the lucidity and fine command of tone-colour and intelligent grasp of the poetic content of the work which had distinguished their singing throughout the week. The soloists—Madame Edna Thornton, Mr. Gervase Elwes and Mr. Frederic Austin—were in the main satisfactory, though hardly rising to the intensity which the music of this passionate work demands. Fatigue no doubt accounted for this, seeing how each is a temperamental and imaginative singer. The concert ended with the Grail Scene and Finale of Act I. of 'Parsifal.' The men's voices in the choruses of Knights of the Grail were most imposing, and a lovely effect of remoteness was obtained by placing a choir of fifty boys and some altos in a chamber in the roof. The mid-height choir was also specially located, as were the bells, the stage trombones and trumpets and titurel. The stage-management was admirably carried out, and something like the Bayreuth effects were obtained. The principals were Mr. Radford, Mr. Elwes, Mr. Austin, Mr. Humphrey Bishop, Miss Skerritt, Mrs. Ibberson, Mr. A. S. Burrows and Mr. William Burrows.

At the close there were cordial felicitations. The Duchess of Norfolk addressed the choir, and Sir Henry Wood was the recipient of a remarkable ovation both from the audience and, later on, from the choir. The Festival was for him and for all concerned a significant artistic triumph.

The 'Tala' Choral Society, at present with a small membership, has been formed at Birmingham with the purpose of presenting new works.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

The absence of the usual preliminary to the opera season in the shape of the cycles of Wagner's 'Ring' has brought the Italian and French works on the scene at a somewhat earlier stage of the proceedings than usual. The performances of the 'Ring' have been deferred until a later date, and the fare so far provided has been of the lightest character. That the desire is to give the most attractive operas in the repertoire was shown from the beginning. For the opening night, on April 22, Délibes's tuneful 'Lakmé' was chosen. This elegant specimen of French opéra comique was revived last season after a silence of over twenty years for the benefit of Madame Tétrazini, and she again appeared in it on this occasion with her artistic colleagues, MM. John McCormack and Edmund Burke. If the spirit of the performance is any guide, then the season began too soon, for no one except Mr. Burke seemed to have warmed to their task, and the interpretation was wanting in vitality. Matters improved in the next representation, which was M. Saint-Saëns's 'Samson et Dalila,' one of the most successful productions ever seen at Covent Garden. Its success was due without question to the splendid work of Madame Kirkby Lunn as Dalila. She returned to her task with no sign of the deterioration that comes from over-familiarity, and M. Dalmores, as Samson, as usual gave her excellent support. Mr. Edmund Burke repeated his impersonation of the High Priest, and M. Huberdeau, a new-comer with a bass voice of great possibilities and cultivated ability as an actor, made a good impression as the aged Hebrew. Later there was a revival of Verdi's once popular opera, 'Un Ballo in Maschera.' On this occasion, as on the last when it was heard four years ago, its restoration to the bill was for the purpose of introducing one particular singer. In 1907, it was Madame Selma Kurz whose work justified the compliment; in this instance it was Mlle. Wilna, a young English soprano, who had been heard on the concert-platform, where her unfamiliarity with the stage and her inexperience as a singer were not revealed as they were when she attempted the part of Oscar. The efforts of Mlle. Bland, a new recruit to Covent Garden, and of Signor Bassi, the tenor, who made his reappearance, were of greater weight, while the authority of the performance was established by Signor Sammarco as Kenato. The opera was well received, probably because it revealed to many the source of airs they knew, but of whose origin they were ignorant. By way of contrast, and to vary the bill, M. Debussy's enigmatical work—it is scarcely an opera—'Pelléas et Mélisande' followed in the same week. In this M. Ghasne, who had not been heard before, achieved a marked success as the Golaud, for he showed a close appreciation of the psychological aspect of the character. M. Warnery, who was absent last season through illness, returned to his part of Pelléas with all success, and the Melisande was Madame Edvina, who may count it among her best efforts, even though it is wanting in spirituality. Signor Marcoux was the Arkel. It is in this music that the real and beautiful quality of his voice is made plain. Signor Campanini, who conducted all the operas named, was particularly successful in realizing the points of the score—a most important consideration—that is, as far as a talkative audience would let him. In the succeeding week M. Charpentier's 'Louise,' whose spirit seems to be completely understood, was seen for the first time this season. While the limitations of M. Debussy's self-imposed vocabulary become more marked at each hearing, the utterances of his fellow-countryman, Charpentier, seem to possess greater eloquence on repetition, and his music falls on the ear with conviction. The cast was the same as in previous seasons, namely, Madame Edvina as a graceful Louise, M. Dalmores as the lover, Madame Berat with her wonderful study of the Mother, and Signor Marcoux in a carefully-considered reading of the part of the Father. By this time matters had become more vitalised, and the representation of Puccini's 'Madama Butterfly' at the end of the week, marked the close of a series of performances in which everybody taking part seemed more or less to be suffering from inertia. Mlle. Destinn made her first appearance this year in 'Madama Butterfly,' and showed at once that, if anything, her voice has improved. The colourless character of her lower notes—the result of an endeavour to get resonance in the 'medium' register—has largely disappeared, to the gain of the voice generally. She sang the music with power, and with full effect in its tragic moments. Signor Bassi was the Pinkerton, but the absence of sympathy in the part caused him to show his worst defects, which include a tendency to whiteness of tone in the middle of the voice. Both he and Madame Destinn approached nearer the high plane on which they have been placed by the public in the performance of Verdi's 'Aida,' that came next. A new Amonasro in M. Gilly, who has not sung in London before, added to the interest of the representation, which was of notable spirit and vocal achievement. Lastly, in addition to such familiar works as 'Rigoletto,' there is to be recorded the reappearance of Madame Melba as the most delightful of Mimis in Puccini's 'La Bohème,' with Mr. John McCormack as the lover, Mlle. Borzy as a vivacious Musetta, and MM. Sammarco, Marcoux, and Malatesta as the complement of the cheerful band. The list is completed by the revival of Bizet's 'Carmen,' in which Madame Kirkby Lunn appeared in the title rôle with greater success than before in her characterization, and with all complete triumph in her interpretation of the music. M. Dalmores was the Don José, and though hampered by indisposition, showed that his impersonation under normal conditions would be memorable. M. Ghasne was the Toreador, but his sympathies would seem to be with the music of France of to-day. Signor Panizza was the conductor.

THE FESTIVAL OF EMPIRE.

THE OPENING.

The loyal greeting accorded to their Majesties King George and Queen Mary, when they opened the Festival of Empire at the Crystal Palace on May 12, was probably unexampled in choral magnificence. Larger choirs have perhaps been brought together, but not as a pure and simple act of homage; and, moreover, the statistics of these festival gatherings are often indefinite. On this occasion, however, figures were not used 'as illustrations,' and the estimate of 4,000 voices comes from the most trustworthy sources. The less calculable quantity of their merits as a singing body was offered for the judgment of every ear, and a unanimous verdict of praise placed the artistic and spectacular properties of the Imperial Choir on the same high level. Many reasons contributed to the excellence of the choralism. The selection of singers from existing metropolitan societies ensured their experience and proper vocal attainments, and the year's postponement necessitated by the death of King Edward VII. expanded the opportunities for rehearsal and organization; above all, Dr. Charles Harriss, the leading spirit and chief controller of the Imperial Choir scheme, was pre-eminently the right man in the right position. He is the man not only to conceive but to carry out great plans, and his spark of enthusiasm is almost radio-active in its power of kindling enthusiasm in others. The cheers which accompanied his arrival at the conductor's desk and his departure were a tribute of real admiration for his personality and his far-reaching ideals.

To secure an instrumental force sufficient to support and balance the choir, the Queen's Hall and London Symphony Orchestras and the Festival of Empire Military Band were engaged, and Mr. Walter W. Hedgcock added his assistance at the organ. The programme carried out by this mighty combination was as follows:

'God save the King' ... Arranged by Elgar.
An Imperial Greeting, 'Empire of the Sea' ... Harriss.
Suite for Orchestra ... Purcell-Wood.

The Queen's Hall Orchestra.

(Conducted by Sir Henry Wood.)

Song, 'The Enchantress' ... Hattton.

Madame Clara Butt.

Patriotic Chorus, 'For Empire and for King' Fletcher.

(Awarded first-prize of £50 in Dr. Harriss's Empire Chorus Competition.)

Songs of the Sea ... C. Villiers Stanford.

1. 'Drake's drum.' 2. 'The Old Superb.'

Mr. Thorpe Bates.

Recessional, 'God of our fathers' ... Dykes.

Overture, 'Britannia' ... Sir A. C. Mackenzie.

Conducted by the composer.

Solo and Chorus, 'Land of hope and glory' ... Elgar.

'Orestes' march from 'Hypatia' ... Sir Hubert Parry.

Conducted by the composer.

Epilogue and March, 'It comes from the Misty Ages' Elgar.

It was preceded, at the moment of their Majesties' entry, by an effective fanfare of trumpets devised and conducted by Mr. W. H. Bell. This was followed immediately by the National Anthem which, except for an unremediated contrapuntal experiment, was impressively sung. An appropriate note of joyousness was introduced by Dr. Harriss's lively waltz-like chorus, and, incidentally, its tripping, syncopated thirds afforded a first glimpse of the excellent discipline of the choir. Reliable authorities seated near the front have assured us that the Purcell suite was a fine piece of music and that it was admirably played. Mr. Percy Fletcher's prize patriotic chorus 'For Empire and for King' was the choral work of chief import, and it worthily sustained the honour. Seldom has the decision of judges in musical competitions of this type been so widely approved. The broad, patriotic style is Mr. Fletcher's most natural method of expression, and both his verses and his music are characterized by their fluency. The latter contains no injudicious modernities or executive problems, but achieves artistic aims and intelligibility by its melodic flow and rhythmic variety. Its climax is trying for the soprano voices, but it is hugely effective. Throughout his work Mr. Fletcher handles his orchestra with confidence and certainty. The singing of Kipling's verses to Dykes's hymn enabled both choir and audience to express more solemn feelings, and the earnestness with which the multitude of onlookers lent their voices to the majestic strain revealed the deeper sentiment that underlay the holiday-making.

It may be safely said that the performance of 'Land of hope and glory,' with Madame Clara Butt as soloist, and that of the Epilogue were unique. In both cases the breadth of the music caused no detail, choral or orchestral, to be lost, and full advantage to be drawn from the quality and extent of the resources taking part. The three knights who conducted, two in charge of their own compositions, were enthusiastically received. Both the 'Britannia' overture and the Processional March were well adapted to the occasion, in spirit and in matter, and the performances were duly effective. Mr. Walter W. Hedgcock's organ playing was unflinching in its efficiency and artistic judgment. Mr. Theodore Flint was the pianoforte accompanist.

The audience, which was one of the largest that has ever assembled at the Palace, showed an equal interest in music in front of them and Royalty behind. After the concert they streamed into the grounds, which were unrecognisable to the habitué, and in their actual state more promising than picturesque.

DINNER TO MR. DAN GODFREY.

A well-deserved compliment was paid to Mr. Dan Godfrey, conductor of the Bournemouth Municipal Orchestra, on May 15, when a dinner was given to him at the Criterion Restaurant by an influential gathering of musicians. The chairman was Sir Alexander Mackenzie, who, in proposing their guest's health, recalled the time when there were only three orchestras in the country worthy of the name, and only one of them, that of August Manns, at the service of the British composer. Bournemouth, he said, was the first provincial town to show a real public spirit and to point the way, and its example had not been in vain. During the past eighteen years, Mr. Godfrey had achieved a record only equalled at the Crystal Palace; he had given no fewer than 965 classical concerts, he had brought forward the chief productions of Britain, and had upheld persistently and courageously the banner of English music. Sir Hubert Parry, in the course of a characteristic speech, said that nowadays composers had a chance of criticising themselves; this was an age of experiments, which Mr. Godfrey tested. It was remarkable what an amount of rubbish he had avoided. England was now becoming a nest of song-birds, as in the reign of Elizabeth, and this was largely due to Dan Godfrey, who possessed some of the finest qualities of his race. Sir Charles Stanford described an occasion when a lady accosted Mr. Godfrey and said, 'I could not leave Bournemouth without thanking you for the help and comfort your music has afforded during a trying period of four months, in which I have tended an invalid mother.'

Mr. Godfrey said that the compliment paid to him was equally paid to the town and orchestra. He had encountered some prejudice against British music, but had given 482 separate works, many for the first time, by 138 native composers, and had also engaged a number of native artists. His object had been to encourage unknown men, not always because theirs was always first-rate work, but that they might have opportunities of hearing and rectifying mistakes in orchestration. He was glad that municipal music was making headway in the country, though a few towns seemed to be falling back rather than advancing. If he might assign a reason for his success it was that he endeavoured to be practical and to cut his coat according to his cloth, besides which he was well supported by the Corporation of Bournemouth.

Other speakers were Mr. Landon Ronald, Mr. King-Hall (who replied for the Orchestra), Mr. Plunket Greene, the Mayor of Bournemouth, and Alderman Webber. The company included well-known musicians from all parts of the Kingdom.

THE TOUR OF THE SHEFFIELD CHOIR.

The world-tour choir continue to receive hearty welcome wherever they carry their operations, and to rouse enthusiasm with their singing. From Cincinnati they went to Indianapolis, where on April 21 they were rejoined by Sir Edward Elgar as conductor, and assisted by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra in a performance of 'The dream of Gerontius.' At Chicago, where they seem to have had a 'bully time,' they gave the same work on Sunday, April 23, with the Ambrose Thomas Orchestra, under Sir Edward. They proceeded thence to Milwaukee (April 26), Waterloo (April 27), and St. Paul, where Sir Edward Elgar took leave of the choir.

London Concerts.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The season which opened with the first production of Elgar's Violin concerto closed on May 18 with a concert that paid similar honour to British music. Neither Mr. Arthur Hinton's Pianoforte concerto in D minor, played by Miss Katherine Goodson, nor Mr. B. J. Dale's Suite for viola and orchestra, were novelties, although the Romance and Finale from the latter work, played by Mr. Lionel Tertis, were heard in their orchestral garb for the first time. Mr. Dale is one of the most careful among our younger composers to preserve the high quality of his work, and the outcome of his self-critical faculty is well-instanced in these movements, which are of consistent strength and well-controlled imagination. Mr. Hinton's work has previously received commendation, which has been confirmed by public popularity. The symphony performed was that of Schubert in C, which has seldom sounded as great as it did on this occasion in the hands of Herr Nikisch. The concert concluded with the Tannhäuser overture, and Sir Henry Wood's arrangement of the National Anthem.

NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

This organization brought its season to a close at Queen's Hall on May 2 with a concert devoted to British music. The work of chief interest was Mr. Henry Gibson's 'Symphonic Rhapsody,' which aims at compressing a symphony into a movement in the manner of the Cobbett Fantasia. Its chief merit, however, was not concerned with matters of design, but consisted of rich and effective scoring. Mr. York Bowen's Pianoforte concerto in E flat was played brilliantly by Miss Irene Scharer, and other works in the programme were Mr. Balfour Gardiner's 'Overture to a Comedy,' Mr. William Wallace's 'The passing of Beatrice,' and Mr. Gustav von Holst's 'Somerset Rhapsody.' Verdi's 'Ah fors è lui' was sung by Madame Wilna, and Mr. Landon Ronald and various composers conducted.

This Orchestra also gave an 'In Memoriam' concert, under Mr. Ronald, at Queen's Hall, on May 6, when the principal number in the programme was Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The postponement of the production of Dr. Walford Davies's new symphony, announced for the concert at Queen's Hall on May 15, had adequate compensation in the performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony in E minor, for Herr Nikisch is unrivalled in the interpretation of this work. A further feature of interest was Mr. Holbrooke's tone-poem, 'Queen Mab,' one of the most imaginative and generally acceptable of his works. Mr. Ernest Schelling played the solo part of M. Paderewski's Pianoforte concerto in A.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAS.

Mendelssohn's 'Scotch symphony' was the chief work played by the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society, at Queen's Hall, on April 27. The programme, which was carried out with the usual efficiency under Mr. Arthur Payne, also included Berlioz's 'Benvenuto Cellini' overture, the Bell song from 'Lakmé,' sung by Miss Lily Wormald, and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Onaway, awake,' sung by Mr. Morgan Kingston.

The Wilhelm Sachse orchestra undertook an excellent programme at Queen's Hall, on May 16, in which Brahms's first Symphony occupied the chief position. The performance under Mr. Sachse's direction was distinguished by spirit and some subtlety. M. Gérard played Saint-Saëns's A minor Violoncello concerto, and Miss Ada Forrest gave vocal solos.

The third Symphony of Brahms was skilfully and expressively played by the South Hampstead Orchestra, under the direction of Mrs. Julian Marshall, at Queen's Hall on May 20. Perhaps the interest centred, however, in Herr Kreisler's magnificent interpretation of Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole,' for violin and orchestra, or in the singing of a scene from Act I. of 'Siegfried' by Mr. Thomas Meux (Siegfried) and Mr. Sydney Russell (Mime). The programme also included the overtures to 'Hänsel und Gretel' and 'Die Meistersinger.'

A trio of consummate artists, Miss Fanny Davies, Señor Pablo Casals, and Mr. J. Campbell McInnes gave a concert at Æolian Hall on May 8, with a programme entirely devoted to Bach and Brahms. The following instrumental numbers were played:

Sonata in G minor, written for viol de gamba and clavier	...	...	...	Bach
Suite in C for violoncello	...	...	...	Bach
Two Capricci and two Intermezzi for pianoforte	...	...	...	Brahms
Sonata in F, Op. 99, for violoncello and pianoforte	...	...	...	Brahms

Mr. McInnes sang three songs from Bach's cantatas and three of Brahms's 'Mägelone-Lieder.' Violin obbligati were supplied by Mr. Alfred Gibson. There was naturally a large audience.

The height of contrast was afforded in the programme of the Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society's concert on May 13 by Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' and Hubert Bath's, 'The Wedding of Shon Maclean.' The choir entered fully into the spirit of both works, and made splendid use of all the technical qualities they have acquired in Mr. Allen Gill's hands. The solo parts were taken by Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Miss Maud Wright, Mr. Gwilym Richards, and Mr. Peter Dawson.

M. Jules Wertheim brought a number of his compositions before the public at Queen's Hall on May 9, with the assistance of the London Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Hamilton Harty. His Symphony in E minor had more than a tendency to gloom; the 'Rhapsody' for pianoforte and orchestra was more inspiring. Perhaps some of the composer's happiest ideas, however, were contained in six Preludes for pianoforte, which he played himself.

A selection of madrigals of the usual interest was sung by the Magpie Madrigal Society under Mr. Lionel Benson at the Horticultural Hall on May 4. The programme included three 'chansons' for choir—'Petite Camusette' by Dépres, 'Jay cause de moy contentier' by Mathias Sohier, and 'Au joli bois' by Charles Tessier.

The programme chosen by Mr. Smallwood Metcalfe for his choir to sing at Queen's Hall on May 10 was largely one of repetitions, but the large share devoted to madrigals lent it distinction. Herr Kreisler was the chief soloist of the occasion.

MM. Vsaye and Pugno, inimitable interpreters of Beethoven, gave concerts at Queen's Hall on the afternoons of April 26, May 3, and May 10, and played the whole series of Beethoven's Sonatas for violin and pianoforte.

Herr Hans Bottermund made his first appearance in London at Bechstein Hall on April 27, and showed himself a violoncellist of the highest rank. His programme included his own accompanied 'Variations on a theme by Paganini.'

Messrs. Julius Harrison and Easthope Martin gave a concert of their compositions at Æolian Hall on April 28. Mr. Harrison, whose ability is well-known, introduced his String quartet in D minor to London; Mr. Martin's style is less mature, but he is no less earnest.

Miss May Mukle brought forward two new works for violoncello and orchestra by English composers at her concert at Queen's Hall on May 2. Mr. Thomas Dunhill's Variations on 'Sally in our Alley' had many points of technical ingenuity, and Mr. G. von Holst's 'Invocation' was refined, individual, intensely poetic and thoroughly attractive.

Suburban Concerts.

At the concert of the East and West Molesey Choral Society on April 25, a successful performance of Sir F. Bridge's 'Inchcape Rock' was given by the choir and orchestra of over sixty members. Mr. Cecil Abbott had the choir well in hand, and secured a dramatically effective reading.

The East Finchley and Muswell Hill Musical Society gave their seventeenth concert on April 27, at the Lecture Hall, East Finchley, when Bach's 'God's time is the best,' Brahms's 'A Song of Destiny,' Harriess's 'Sands of Dee,' and Parry's 'Blest pair of sirens' were admirably performed. The principals, with songs, were Miss Florence Wray, Miss Joan Ashley, Mr. Philip Ritte, and Mr. Harry Dearth. The excellence of this concert reflected great credit on the conductor, Mr. George R. Ceiley. The orchestra, led by Mr. Percy Green, who gave a violin solo, ably assisted in a most successful concert.

A fine performance of Elgar's 'Gerontius' was given by the Lewisham Choral Society on April 27, at the Blackheath Concert Hall, under the direction of Mr. Frank Idle. The choral singing attained a very high standard, as also did the work of the orchestra, led by Mr. George Wilby. The soloists were Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Jackson Potter. There was a large and enthusiastic audience.

On April 28, the choir of the Brixton Hill Wesleyan Church, augmented for the occasion, performed Sterndale Bennett's 'May Queen' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast,' in the Lecture Hall, in aid of the funds of the Church. There were a band and choir of seventy performers, conducted by Mr. Frank Grant, the organist and choirmaster of the Church. The principal soloists were Mrs. Ella Sinclair, Miss Lily Bones, Mr. Charles Sinden and Mr. T. J. Morgan. The additional programme included Elgar's 'Land of hope and glory,' and the 'Soldiers' chorus' from Gounod's 'Faust.'

For their concert on May 1 the Enfield Highway Choral Society selected an interesting programme, which included Gade's 'Spring's message' and Somervell's 'The forsaken merman' as the chief numbers. The choir sang with spirit and good discipline and tone under the baton of Mr. A. Flower. The solo parts were taken by Mr. W. Jeffree, and an orchestra assisted.

The Richmond Philharmonic Society gave a successful concert on May 2, before a large audience, at the Castle Assembly Rooms. The programme included Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's departure,' and Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet.' The soloists were Miss Norah Newport, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs, and Mr. Stewart Gardner. Dr. Charles E. Jolley conducted.

The Great Western Railway Musical Society (choir and orchestra of eighty performers) brought their season to a close on May 3 with an excellent performance of Hubert Bath's 'The wedding of Shon Maclean,' assisted by Miss Lucy France and Mr. Allen Engles. Mr. Henry A. Hughes conducted with marked ability. In the second part the orchestra played with fine effect, among other items the overture to 'William Tell' (Rossini), conducted, by special request, by Mr. W. Johnson Galloway. Part-songs were contributed by the choir. The concert was held in the Half-yearly Meeting Room, Paddington Station.

On May 3 the Buckhurst Hill Choral Society gave a concert performance of Gounod's 'Faust' which was in every way a great success. The choir sang admirably, and the soloists, Miss Gertrude Blomfield, Miss Christine Birkett, Mr. Alexander Webster and Mr. Humphrey Bishop were excellent. Miss Madge Taylor and Mr. E. J. Woods presided at the pianoforte and organ respectively, Mr. Otley Marshall conducted. The programme announced that Dr. Charles Harriss had consented to become the new President of the Society.

The first London performance of Dr. Ernest Walker's cantata, 'Ode to a Nightingale,' was given by the Orpheus Choral and Orchestral Society at the Hampstead Conservatoire on May 4, under the conductorship of Mr. Claud Powell. A large audience had assembled. The work had been most carefully prepared, and its great beauty was well portrayed, so that the audience was intensely pleased both with the work and its performance. The soloist was Mr. Percival Driver. 'Sir Patrick Spens' (Brewer) was also in the programme.

The complete cycle of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Song of Hiawatha' was performed on May 4, at the Great Central Hall, Bermondsey, by the combined forces of the Bermondsey Settlement and Hither Green Choral Societies, under the direction of Dr. J. E. Borland. The choral singing was alert, bright-toned and responsive, and excellent work was done by the soloists, Miss Oswyn Jones, Mr. Joseph Cheetham, and Mr. Montague Borwell. Mr. E. Stanley Roper, conductor of the Hither Green Society, was at the organ.

The Willesden Green and Cricklewood Choral Society gave a concert at the Hampstead Conservatoire on May 8, when the programme consisted of Handel's 'Zadok the priest,' Mendelssohn's 'Walpurgis night,' and Sullivan's 'Martyr of Antioch.' Mr. F. W. Belchamber, who conducted, deserves congratulation on the excellent training of his choir. There was a fairly efficient orchestra, and the solo vocal parts were sung by Madame Jessie Norman, Miss Gladys Newbould, Mr. Alexander Webster, Mr. Alfred Burch, and Mr. Harrison Latimer.

MacCunn's 'The Wreck of the Hesperus' was the chief work sung by the Waldstein Academy Choral Society at Stratford Town Hall on May 10. Dr. F. J. Karn conducted, and secured an attractive performance. The orchestra assisted in this work, and also played the 'Rosamunde' and 'Figaro' overtures.

The Brockley and Lewisham Orchestral Society gave a concert at Blackheath on May 11, under the direction of Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor. The programme included Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Symphony and a number of well-chosen smaller works such as Schubert's 'Rosamunde' Overture and Delibes's 'Le roi s'amuse' suite, all of which were skilfully and effectively performed. Solos were given by Miss Evangeline Florence and Mr. Herbert Heyner.

The programme of the grand Coronation Festival held by the Fulham and District Choral Society at the Town Hall on May 11, consisted of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' Bridge's 'The flag of England,' Mr. H. J. Taylor's 'The eve of Waterloo,' and 'The Colchester triumph song' (from the Colchester Pageant music), by Mr. George Wilby, conductor of the Society. Both Sir Frederick Bridge and Mr. Taylor were present to conduct their works. The principals were Miss Christine Bywater, Miss M. A. Segar, Mr. F. J. Webster, and Mr. Emmanuel Barson.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BIRMINGHAM.

Birmingham has now completely entered upon the annual 'Saison morte,' and the only concerts in the near future will be the 'Promenades' at the Theatre Royal, given under Mr. Landon Ronald's conductorship, which begin on June 12 and terminate on July 1. Provision has also been made for a series of summer concerts at the Egbaston Botanical Gardens, under Mr. Oscar Pollack's direction as hitherto. There are, however, some local events to be recorded with which the past music season may said to have closed.

To Messrs. Dale & Forty one is indebted for not letting the music season pass without a Chamber concert, and it is therefore gratifying to state that through their instrumentality an excellent concert of chamber music was given at the Queen's College on April 26, by the 'Arthur Catterall' Quartette, a newly-formed artistic combination of players comprising Messrs. Arthur Catterall, Ernest R. O'Malley, David Reggel, and Johan C. Hock. The string quartets chosen for performance were Beethoven's Op. 18, No. 2, in G major, Dvorák's 'Nigger quartet,' and the Andante and variations from Schubert's famous Quartet in D minor. Perfect unanimity and beauty of tone characterized their performance; it is some time since such masterly quartet playing has been heard here. Mr. Arthur Catterall was also heard as a soloist in Bach's 'Chaconne.' Miss Marjorie Sotham played pianoforte works by Debussy and Poldini.

In connection with the Midland Institute School of Music, Mr. Arthur Cooke gave the last of three pianoforte recitals at the large Lecture Hall of that institution on May 6. These recitals are not only an educational factor but also tend to encourage students to devote attention to this important branch in musical art. His programme on this occasion was of a novel character, as it included Balakireff's Oriental Fantasia 'Islamey,' and a number of pieces by Debussy; only a performer of Mr. Arthur Cooke's pianistic skill could have done justice to it as he did.

The Royal Society of Artists' Musical Matinées in connection with the Spring exhibition of pictures, so successfully carried on under Mr. Oscar Pollack's direction, will be brought to a close on June 10. One of the most interesting events of the present series was the pianoforte recital specially arranged by Mr. Claude Crossley, of Sheffield, on May 6, given by his clever young girl pianists, Miss Marjorie Firth, Miss Dorice Parkin, Miss Irene Goodwin, Miss Winifred Rowbotham and Miss Kathleen Waterhouse.

The eleventh annual concert of the students attending the Midland Institute School of Music was held at the Town Hall, on May 10, under the conductorship of Professor Granville Bantock, the principal of the School. The full orchestra and ladies' choir were present, and joined in the performance of a cantata for female choir and orchestra, entitled 'The Nuns of the Perpetual Adoration,' by the American composer and critic, E. Burlingham Hill, based on a poem by E. Christopher Dowson. It is an impressive composition of much originality, but was not heard to best advantage, the choir scarcely realising the right tone-colour in the attainment of light and shade. Wagner's Symphony in C minor was played, and Mr. Rutland Boughton conducted his 'March of the British' and also two of Loewe's Ballads orchestrated by him and sung by Mr. George Painter. The programme also included violin playing by Miss Ursula Edser.

Miss Elma Baker, a local soprano who has studied a good deal on the Continent, gave a recital of French music at the Queen's College on May 15, comprising in addition to a number of 'Melodies populaires,' songs by Vincent d'Indy, Gabriel Pierné, Debussy and Monsigny.

BRISTOL AND DISTRICT.

At the Victoria Rooms, on April 26, the Bristol New Philharmonic Society gave their Spring concert under the direction of Mr. Arnold Barter. The principal vocalists were Miss Laura Evans-Williams and Mr. Jamieson Dodds. A band composed of the chief local players was led by Mr. Harold Bernard. The first part of the concert was devoted to the 'Sea Symphony' by Dr. R. Vaughan Williams, which was admirably performed. The choral singing gave evidence of careful training, and the accompaniments were excellently played. A new Pianoforte concerto in C minor, by Herbert Ferrers, was introduced under the composer's direction, with Miss Jenny Meid at the solo instrument, and was well received. The remainder of the programme consisted of Mr. Hubert Bath's 'Wedding of Shon Maclean.'

The Clifton Male-Voice Choir attracted and interested a large audience on April 27 at Redland Park Hall, a well-selected programme of part-songs being carefully given under the direction of Mr. Walter P. Price. Songs were contributed by Madame Eva Hartshorne and Miss Hazel Gray, and pianoforte solos executed by Mr. Arthur J. Baynon, until recently organist of St. Raphael's Church, Bristol, and now music master to Truro College.

On April 29, Bristol West Choral Society, at the Victoria Rooms, gave a good performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf.' The soloists were Madame Alice Boaden, Mr. R. Hoare Byers, and Mr. R. Fullerton Kerr. The choir and band numbered one hundred, and Mr. Charles Read was the conductor.

The Bristol Choral Society gave their fourth concert of the season on May 6, in combination with the Bath Choral Society, the choir and orchestra numbering 645. The band was led by Mr. Harold Bernard, Mr. G. Herbert Riseley was at the organ, and Mr. George Riseley directed the performance with his customary ability. It was a Coronation Concert, and after the National Anthem Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George' was given (Shapcott Wensley, the author of the libretto, a Bristolian, being present). Handel's anthem 'The King shall rejoice' followed. Miss Lucy Nuttall sang, and M. de Pachmann played pianoforte works by Chopin.

On May 9, the Clifton Choral Society brought their thirtieth season to a close at the Redland Park Hall under the direction of Mr. A. Ernest Hill. The soloists were Miss Irene Howard, Miss Dorothy Dennis, Mr. H. Lewis Wensley and Mr. T. Randall. Pleasing performances of German's 'A Princess of Kensington,' Stanford's 'Last Post' and Handel's 'The King shall rejoice' were given. Mr. Harold Bernard led the orchestra, and contributed some violin solos.

The Broad Plain House Choir held their annual concert on May 9, Mr. Vaughan Jenkins conducting. Gaul's cantata 'A song of life' and some part-songs were nicely sung.

At Knightstone Pavilion, Weston-super-Mare, on May 11, the local Philharmonic Society presented Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' the principal vocalists being Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Thorpe Bates. The choir comprised 170 voices, and under the direction of Mr. Edward Cook exerted themselves to good purpose.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

On April 19, the monthly organ recital given by Mr. Reginald Waddy, organist of Emmanuel Church, Mannanead, comprised organ pieces solely from the compositions of the French composer, Joseph Bonnet. The last of these recitals on May 10, was enlivened by suggestions of the Coronation, the Emmanuel Choral Society combining with the church choir to sing Handel's 'Zadok the Priest,' and a chorus, for sopranos and contraltos only, 'I will give thanks' (W. H. Bullock).

The chamber music presented at their fourteenth concert at Plymouth, by the Misses Smith, on April 20, was interesting as a sign of the times, for the trios by Mr. Frank Bridge and Mr. John Ireland which recently gained the prizes offered by the Worshipful Company of Musicians were those selected for performance. They were played artistically by Miss Florence Smith (pianoforte), Miss Lily Smith (violin), and Mrs. Freeman (cello). Mdme. Minadieu sang pieces by Wolf and Debussy, and three new and interesting songs by 'Barbara Dhu.'

At Mr. R. G. Evans's final symphony concert at Plymouth, on April 26, the 'Symphonie Pathétique' of Tchaikovsky received emotional and artistic treatment. Miss Helen Sealy was associated with the orchestra in the Wieniawski Concerto No. 2, for violin and orchestra; and a Suite for orchestra by Widor, 'La Korrigane,' and Sibelius's 'Valse Triste' were new to Plymouth.

The choir of St. Pancras' Church, Pennycross, on April 26, sang Cowen's 'The Rose maiden,' conducted by Mr. F. E. Notcutt; and on the same evening the annual concert of Mutley Wesleyan Choir consisted of glees and part-songs, conducted by Mr. W. J. Wiberley. The winter series of Library Lectures was closed by a paper on 'Songs and ballads of the Tudor and Stuart periods,' read by Mr. Reginald Waddy on April 29.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

Country choral societies have provided a busy season since Easter, and generally speaking, progress and extension may be recorded. The Chagford Choral Society made a special effort on April 19 by giving two concerts, at both of which Handel's 'Acis and Galatea' was sung remarkably well, Mr. R. Percy Collings conducting, with assistance from Miss May Bartlett, J. S. Perry, and S. J. Bishop. A new class formed at Stokeclimland, under the conductorship of Rev. C. B. Walters, gave good promise at its first appearance in part-songs on April 21. On April 24 the Barnstaple Musical Festival Society, whose singing it is always a pleasure to hear, gave a first performance in Devonshire of 'The Wedding of Shon Maclean,' conducted by the composer, Mr. Hubert Bath, a native of the town, who was enthusiastically greeted. The conductor of the Society, Dr. H. J. Edwards, had no less cordial a reception on his recovery from illness and his appearance not only to conduct an interesting performance of 'Acis and Galatea,' but to play the solo part in Mendelssohn's C minor Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, the latter led capably by Mr. Percy Parish. Rossini's 'Stabat Mater' and Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' were performed by the Sidmouth Choral Society (of interesting traditions), under Mr. J. A. Bellamy, with the Misses Edith Kirkwood, May Peters, and Messrs. Frank Webster and Walter Belgrove as principals. The two Exeter societies occupied the next day with two concerts. It is to be feared that the amalgamation of the Exeter Oratorio Society and the Western Counties Musical Association has not resulted in the raising of the standard. In the afternoon Mr. Hubert Bath again conducted his 'Wedding of Shon Maclean,' which was preceded by 'The sleeping beauty' (Cowen), conducted by Dr. D. J. Wood. The evening work was 'St. Paul,' conducted by Dr. H. J. Edwards. The quality of the choir was variable, and at times the singers did not seem well acquainted with the work in hand. But the material was good, and in the oratorio some artistic effects and generally a good spirit were attained. On April 28, Miss Muriel Herbert (pianoforte) and Miss Hilda Herbert (a promising contralto débütante) gave a recital at Exeter, assisted by Miss May Bartlett (violin). Brixham Choral Society sang a concert adaptation of 'The Princess of Kensington' on May 3, conducted by F. Brett Young, and on the same date a new organ was 'opened' in Bristoweston United Methodist Church by Mr. George Hele. Vocal recitals given in Exeter by Miss Vera Watkins were interesting as marking her first appearance, and she was assisted by the 'Isca Glee Singers' and Miss Violet Shapcott (violin). Ashburton Choral Society, after a year's lapse for financial reasons, appeared again on May 4 to sing 'Elijah,' thereby proving that they had not lost interest in the interval, but had evidently been kept well in training by their capable and enthusiastic conductor, Mr. Harold O. Jones. At Newton Abbot, on May 8, the Congregational Church choir sang Eaton Fanning's 'Daybreak,' conducted by Mr. J. H. Snow. A male-voice 'Coronation' concert at Exeter on May 12, and a performance of 'Songs of the West' in costume, given at Plympton on May 17, under the direction of Mr. Manley Martin, must also be noticed.

At the last concert of the Exeter Orchestral Society, conducted by Dr. Wood on May 2, Mrs. Kenyon played Mozart's Concerto No. 2, in A, for pianoforte and orchestra; and the orchestra introduced an overture, 'Wood nymphs,' by Bennett, and the 'Comique' overture by Keler Bela, playing also a movement from a Schumann symphony (No. 1).

New organs have been opened in St. Sidwell's Church, Exeter, and the Cathedral Church, Torquay, during the month.

Paignton Operatic Society during the week of April 25 gave excellent performances of 'Haddon Hall,' conducted by Mr. F. L. Harris; and in the same week the Kingsbridge Operatic Society, conducted by Mr. W. Beer, gave 'Dorothy' very creditably. The D'Oyly Carte Opera Company have made a tour of Devonshire (Exeter, Torquay and Plymouth).

At the annual meeting of the Exeter Amateur Operatic Society on May 16, it was reported that the recent performances of 'Merrie England' had produced a net profit of £162, of which £155 was voted to charitable institutions.

CORNWALL.

There exist in Cornwall a number of small country choral societies, who work with enthusiasm under considerable difficulties of distance and isolation, and these are deserving of special encouragement. The Madron class of fifty voices sang 'The May Queen' (Bennett), assisted by a small orchestra of amateurs, conducted by Mr. A. H. Thorne, whose class at Marazion sang Gounod's 'Faust' on April 26; and on the same date the Merifield Choral Society sang part-songs under Mr. A. Greet. At Mousehole, on April 30, the Penzance Y.M.C.A. Male-Voice Choir joined in a programme given by the choir of the Wesleyan Church, who sang under the baton of Mr. R. N. Thomas. Mr. H. C. Tonking (London) gave an organ recital in Redruth United Methodist Church on April 30. The Easter concerts of the Truro and Falmouth Philharmonic Societies were not given in amalgamation, as is their custom. The Falmouth Society, on May 1, rendered 'The Banner of St. George,' conducted by Rev. Canon Corfe, and received vocal assistance from Miss Edith Blight (soprano); and on the following day the Truro Society, also conducted by Rev. Canon Corfe, sang a programme of seven part-songs. On May 3, Mr. Alan Thorne's Penzance choral class gave an excellent performance of the 'Hiawatha' trilogy, thus introducing it to the Land's End town. Mention may be made of the opening of a new organ in Harrowbarrow United Methodist Church on May 4.

EDINBURGH.

In aid of the Orphan Fund of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, a series of Tableaux Vivants, symbolic of the music of European countries, with orchestral illustrations, national dances, madrigals, and part-songs, was presented in the Music Hall on May 19 and 20. The countries represented were Italy (Corelli rebuking a Cardinal who by conversation had interrupted a performance of music); France (Minuet in a French salon); Spain (Bolero); Germany (Beethoven alone with nature); Slavonic Nations (Polish Mazurka); Scandinavia (Norwegian wedding procession); England (Morris dance); Scotland (The Scottish harp; in connection with which Miss Margaret Kennedy, accompanied on the harp by Mrs. Sherwood Begbie, sang an old Gaelic song; and a Highland interior, in which a Scottish reel was danced to pipe music). An invisible choir, conducted by Mr. John Kirkhope, sang madrigals and part-songs delightfully, and an orchestra, also unseen, led by Mr. Winram and conducted by Mr. T. H. Collinson, provided the instrumental music. Tableaux were arranged by Mr. William Hole, Mr. James Paterson, Mr. John Duncan, Mr. John Menzies, Mr. H. J. Lintot, and Mr. Graham Glen; dances by Madame Marie MacLennan, Miss E. Gray-Macfarlane, and Mr. MacLennan. Mr. Greeme Goring, in the character of a herald, introduced each tableau in an appropriate quatrain. The stage-manager was Mr. Duncan Rhind. The successful production of the varied tableaux, some of which were remarkably beautiful, was greatly enjoyed by audiences which filled the hall on both evenings.

GLASGOW.

Through the munificence of the late Miss Susan Cramb, of the Hermitage, Helensburgh, the University of Glasgow is now in a position to institute a Lectureship or a Chair of music. By the terms of Miss Cramb's bequest a sum of £8,000 is to be invested, to the extent of £6,000 for the purpose of endowing the Lectureship or Chair, £1,000 to provide bursaries to the students attending the music classes, and £1,000 to assist poorer students attending the music classes who show ability to pursue their studies elsewhere. The University Court has accepted the benefaction, and steps will forthwith be taken to give effect to the testator's wishes.

Last season's operations of the Choral and Orchestral Union have again resulted in a loss necessitating a call on the guarantee fund to the extent of twenty-five per cent. Considering the magnitude of the Union's scheme the deficit is perhaps small, but it is difficult to account for the lack of public support unless it be the multiplicity of counter-attractions, each claiming its own following. The management are already considering their plans for next season, and it is expected that there will be a revival of interest and support towards a scheme which is in every way so worthy of a city like Glasgow. This year we are having the unusual experience of a second musical season caused by the opening of the National Scottish Exhibition, which will continue from May till October. The scope of the Exhibition is far exceeding the original plan of the promoters, and musical attractions are being made a special feature. In addition to the appearance of stars of the magnitude of Kubelik, Pachmann, &c., choral music will be well represented. During the opening week the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under Sir Henry J. Wood, gave a series of performances, and on May 12, the Choral Union sang Mr. Hamish MacCunn's 'The lay of the last minstrel.' This work was, we believe, composed for and produced by the Choral Union in 1888, and it had therefore the charm of novelty to most of the audience. Save for occasional lapses from the pitch a satisfactory performance was given under the baton of the composer. The soloists were Misses Jenny Young and Agnes Picken, and Messrs. John Jamieson and Robert Burnett, and a capable band led by Mr. Verbruggen supplied the accompaniments. Great interest is being evinced in the inauguration here of the Competitive Festival movement, which takes place in the Exhibition on June 23 and 24. The entries for the various classes in the competitions are numerous, and everything is promising exceedingly well for the successful launching of the movement.

GLOUCESTER

The Gloucester Orchestral Society held their concert on April 21, when they also had the assistance of the Gloucester Orpheus Society. There was a large attendance, and the concert was of a most successful character. Dr. A. Herbert Brewer conducted both Societies in their various items. The contributions of the instrumentalists were Beethoven's Symphony in A, No. 7; Weber's 'Oberon' Overture; and Dvorák's Slavonic Dances, Nos. 1 and 3. The playing was exceptionally good. Most of the items given by the Orpheus Society were old favourites, but they were very well chosen to show the varied talents of which the Orpheonists are possessed. Their selections were 'A Toast' (Brewer); 'Stars of the Summer night' (Cruikshank); 'The phantom host' (Hegar); 'An Analogy' (C. H. H. Parry); 'My true love hath my heart' (C. Lee Williams); and MacDowell's 'Dance of the gnomes.' Mr. W. H. Reed, who is the professional instructor to the Orchestral Society, contributed an interesting selection of violin solos.

The last concert of the Gloucester Choral Society's fiftieth season was held on May 9, and, as is customary with the last performance of each season, the programme was of a miscellaneous description. The chorals, who were in very good voice, sang Bach's unaccompanied Motett for double chorus, 'Now shall the Grace'; Mr. P. Napier Miles's 'Ode to Maia,' a very beautiful unaccompanied part-song; and Sir Edward Elgar's 'Banner of St. George.' The latter was given with the necessary vigour and volume. Mr. A. P. Porter played the organ, and Dr. Brewer conducted. The soloists of the concert were Miss Gladys Honey, Miss Lucy Nuttall, and Mr. W. H. Squire.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

The annual meeting of the Philharmonic Society was hardly of a harmonious nature, although the financial report of the past season was entirely satisfactory, for it showed a total profit of £839. The usual votes of thanks were passed to the conductor, Dr. F. H. Cowen, to the chorus-master, Mr. Branscombe, to the members of the choir, and to the secretary, Mr. Riley, with an added expression of sympathy concerning Dr. Cowen's illness. The vexed questions as to the conductorship, and the choice of music were unpleasantly revived at the meeting. It would appear that the committee's desire and endeavour to meet the wishes of all musical people of whatever school had been unsuccessful. To judge by the attitude and language of some of the speakers, it seemed as if music whether 'German' or 'English' had a demoralising influence upon shareholders. Opinions and preferences were freely expressed and debated by more or less irresponsible speakers. The end of the matter was the upholding of Dr. Cowen's engagement as conductor for eight of next season's concerts. The other four concerts are to be conducted by distinguished musical guests, who will include M. Rachmaninoff.

A movement is on foot to establish the memory of the late Alfred E. Rodewald—an amateur who did much for the development of orchestral music in this city—by the formation of a society on Bohemian lines to be called the 'Rodewald Concert Club,' to meet every fortnight during the winter season. Sir C. V. Stanford has accepted the position of president.

The well-known violinist, Mr. Ernst Schiever, is about to leave Liverpool after a connection of more than thirty years, and to retire from the profession with which he has been long and honourably identified. His work as leader of the Richter Orchestra is widely known, and locally the Schiever Quartet has done much to encourage a taste for classical chamber music. By his departure the Wirral and Blundellsands Amateur Orchestral Societies lose an able conductor. Like his famous chief, Dr. Richter, Mr. Schiever takes with him into his retirement the best wishes of the musical community.

The Cloughton St. Cecilia Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Appleyard, concluded their twenty-third season with a performance of Schumann's 'Paradise and the Peri,' with pianoforte accompaniment. The soloists were Mrs. Royden, Mrs. Stanley Clarke, and Mr. Lloyd Moore, a local tenor, who sings artistically. The chorus singing showed intelligent intention.

The Fairfield Glee and Madrigal Society, one of the smaller societies doing good work in the suburbs, gave a successful concert on April 25, when they sang among other pieces Stevens's 'Cloud-capt towers,' Elgar's 'She dwelt in a northern land,' and Bantock's male-voice chorus 'Give a rouse.' Mr. Arthur Davies conducted, and songs were sung by Miss Olive Parsonage and Mr. Lloyd Moore, with violin solos cleverly played by Mr. Horace Cropper.

The Anfield Orchestral Society closed their third season on April 26 with a concert which was conducted by Mr. William Faulkes, the well-known organ composer. His enthusiasm is shared by this earnest body of amateur instrumentalists, who were heard in the 'Oberon' Overture, and Beethoven's first Symphony. A highly interesting performance was also given of Schumann's Pianoforte concerto, in which the solo was played by Mr. William Dawson, a veteran local pianist, organist and composer, whose instrumental works both in print and in manuscript deserve to be better-known. He played with executive mastery two striking examples in his Adagio in F, and Valse in A on a chromatic basis.

Mr. Legge, City Director of Education, presided at the annual meeting of the Liverpool Village Choir on May 3. Since its inauguration, eleven years ago, the Choir, composed of children trained by Mr. R. T. Edwards, has won no fewer than twenty-two first prizes in various competitions.

Mr. Frederic Brandon concluded his interesting series of three pianoforte recitals in the Rushworth Hall on May 6, when a cleverly-played programme included Brahms's 'Variations on a theme by Paganini' and a group of Chopin pieces.

Sterndale Bennett's 'May Queen' was given by the Central Hall orchestra and choir at the closing concert of the Saturday evening popular concerts on May 6, the soloists being Miss Gertrude Vane, Mr. Lloyd Moore and Mr. W. H. Cross.

WEST KIRBY AND HOYLAKE MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

The success which attended the inception of this Festival three years ago has encouraged the promoters to establish it as a triennial event. That it meets with the approval of the residents of this pleasant place in the Wirral peninsula may be inferred from the satisfactory attendances. As regards the programmes of the four concerts held in the Public Hall, West Kirby, on May 11, 12 and 13, the committee did not appear to attach undue importance to novelties, and the only absolutely new work brought to a hearing was Dr. W. B. Brierley's 'Concert Overture.' As the hard-working conductor and hon. co-secretary of the Festival, Dr. Brierley had quite earned his opportunity. A judicious and interesting choice of choral works was made in Sir Hubert Parry's 'Song of Darkness and Light,' Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' Elgar's 'Banner of St. George,' and 'Elijah.' Leading English vocalists were engaged in Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Emily Breare, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. Herbert Brown, and with these well-tried artists were associated Mr. Arthur Catterall (solo violin and leader of the orchestra of forty-three players), Mr. Egon Petri (solo pianoforte), and a choir of 150 voices. Dr. Brierley had therefore command over excellent material, and if not great in number, the forces were proportionate to the space available. To the opening concert on May 11, distinction was given by the presence of Sir Hubert Parry, who himself conducted his noble 'Song of Darkness and Light,' Aided by Miss Agnes Nicholls, who sang the soprano solo 'Peace' with inspiring effect, the orchestra and choir worked with a will under the composer's baton, with commendable result if not with absolute finish of detail. Sir Hubert was warmly recalled. Dr. Brierley's 'Concert Overture' is a well-written work. It bears no title as to its import, but as serious abstract music, cast in orthodox form and modern in feeling, it is interesting, not so much perhaps on account of the distinction of its themes, as by reason of the freedom and vigour of their development. As soloist in Beethoven's Violin concerto, Mr. Arthur Catterall displayed a correct conception and an ample technical equipment. A too-generous programme terminated with Sir Hubert Parry's 'Symphonic Variations,' of which a pleasantly-anticipated hearing was possible only to residents.

The Friday evening concert included Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' and 'Alto Rhapsody,' the latter sung by Miss Phyllis Lett, for whom the music lies too high. In Stanford's inspiring 'Songs of the Fleet,' Mr. Herbert Brown and the male-voice choir did not secure an altogether ideal interpretation. This was more nearly reached in three of Elgar's 'Sea Pictures,' beautifully sung by Miss Phyllis Lett, and also by the band in Schubert's 'Unfinished Symphony.' In Elgar's delightful choral ballad with orchestra, 'The Banner of St. George,' the choir showed to better advantage, being apparently inspired by the melodious qualities of this short, effective, picturesque work. On Saturday afternoon the programme was entirely instrumental, the orchestra being augmented. It commenced with a brilliant performance by Mr. Egon Petri of Liszt's E flat Pianoforte concerto. The 'Siegfried Idyll' and 'Pathetic Symphony' are familiar items of which Dr. Brierley secured musically interpretations. On Saturday evening the Festival was brought to a successful close in a performance of Mendelssohn's ever-welcome and ever-profitable 'Elijah,' in which the vocal principals included Miss Emily Breare, Miss Mabel Corran, Mr. Gervase Elwes, Mr. Herbert Brown, and Master Ernest Hill, a treble from Dr. Brierley's Parish Church choir. On this occasion the chorus sang very well, although chief honours fell elsewhere. The Festival ended appropriately as it began, in the strains of the National Anthem, sung to Sir Charles Stanford's arrangement.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

After the chaos of 'Götterdämmerung' came reflection and a desultory correspondence in the papers as to the precise ethical, philosophical, zoological significance of some parts of Wagner's great tetralogy—all betokening an awakened and stimulated interest. Then came the question of the personality of the visiting conductors for the next Hallé season. A column-long letter appeared in the Manchester Guardian over the signatures of your esteemed Berlin correspondent and of the assistant-editor of the Berlin Signale, in which it was rightly stated that 'the entire musical world is taking a very considerable interest in what may happen in Manchester.'

The delightfully naive statement that, 'as Dr. Richter's successor, a man must be found holding an important place in Continental musical life,' with its airy assumption that nobody this side of the North Sea matters, created some mild amusement; but this apart, there was much informing matter in the letter. As yet the Executive have not actually disclosed their choice of conductors, but Elgar is to conduct the opening concert with his new Symphony in E flat; Bantock is also to conduct his new unaccompanied 'Choral Symphony' in twenty parts—a setting of a portion of Swinburne's 'Atalanta in Calydon' commencing 'Before the beginning of years.' This work is likely to prove epoch-making in the history of choral art in this country. Ostensibly only a 'study' for a larger-scale work on the subject of 'Pan,' the composer has gone considerably in advance of anything yet known in his use of choral forces in the manner of an orchestra; the voices are treated as strings, wood-wind and brass, and many wonderful effects of colour are obtained. The Hallé choir are having summer rehearsals in order to grapple with its unusual difficulties. Other conductors will probably include Sir Henry Wood, Karl Muck of Berlin, Schalk of Vienna, Balling and Müller-Reuter.

Sir Henry Wood will conduct the four orchestral concerts of the Gentlemen's series again, an unusual feature being performances of choral works for female voices accompanied by orchestra; the selection will be drawn from Berlioz, Schumann, Schubert, Tchaikovsky, Elgar, and others; in making the announcement Mr. Broadfield omitted to mention the name of the choir engaged for this interesting performance.

At the Council meeting of the Royal Manchester College of Music, Dr. J. Kendrick Pyne was appointed honorary curator of the 'Henry Watson collection of musical instruments.' Dr. Brodsky reported that the Students' Sustentation Fund would benefit by £72 6s. 4d. as a result of the past season's Brodsky Quartet concerts, and that Dr. Richter had contributed £10 to the same Fund, besides a valuable collection of musical scores to the College Library. Feeling reference was made to the great loss sustained by the musical public and the art of music generally in the death of Lady Hallé, and condolences were sent to Madame Ariberg, Miss Olga Neruda and Mr. Franz Neruda.

The Council have appointed Mr. Frank Merrick as professor of the pianoforte in succession to Mr. Egon Petri.

The Manchester Orpheus Glee Society are touring the Rhineland provinces during Whit-week; the party will travel some eighty male voices strong, under their renowned conductor, Mr. Walter Sheridan Nesbitt, accompanied by numerous friends, including the German Consul in Manchester. Leaving Manchester on June 2, they are due at Frankfurt on Saturday afternoon, and in the choir's honour Strauss's 'Salome' will be staged at the Frankfurt Opera House. On Whit-Sunday and Monday visits will be paid to Wiesbaden and Homburg, open-air concerts probably being given at both these spa-resorts. Whit-Tuesday will be devoted to sight-seeing in and around Frankfurt, with some music at Baden-Nauheim in the evening, whilst on Whit-Wednesday there is to be a public reception in recognition of the choir's visit in the Palmgarten of Frankfurt. The next day they travel by water to Köln, where they will be accorded a civic reception, as well as enjoying convivial intercourse with those 'Sons of Art' the Kölner Männergesangverein, who visited Manchester two or three years ago. Mr. Nesbitt may be trusted to exclude all music of meretricious order: Gibbons, Horsley, Beale, Walmisley, Tom Cooke will represent the older glee-writers, with Hutton, Goss, Sullivan and Stainer as typical of the Victorian composers in this manner, whilst Elgar's 'Greek Anthology' songs and 'Reveille' and Bantock's new 'Lost Leader' and 'Lucifer in Starlight' will reveal English art in its latest aspect; MacDowell's 'From the sea' and 'Dance of gnomes' will stand for the best in American art, and Continental composers will include Mendelssohn, Brahms, Hegar, Cornelius ('Der alte Soldat'), Max Bruch, Strauss, Sibelius, Max Reger—a worthy list indeed, and incidentally a fine tribute to the work done 'farther north' by the competitive movement in the last ten years, for all these thirty selections have been used as test-pieces at various Lancashire festivals in that period.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE AND DISTRICT.

Schubert's Masses are unaccountably neglected by choral societies, especially by the smaller societies which, one would think, ought to be anxious to produce works of such beauty and so easy to grapple with. The inclusion of one by the Catholic Choral Society at their annual concert on April 26 was a welcome innovation. The soloists were Misses O. Clare and M. Scarborough, and Messrs. V. Hardy and W. Batey. Mr. R. Curry conducted. The same evening the Durham Musical Society gave 'The Spectre's Bride,' with orchestra. Canon Culley conducted, and the soloists were Miss R. James, Mr. W. Hudson, and Mr. H. Parker.

That Schubert's great Symphony in C should not have been played in Newcastle for over twenty years (at any rate by a professional orchestra) is a striking comment upon the neglect of that branch of art in our midst. The hiatus has been filled by the Philharmonic Orchestra with a performance of the immortal work on the afternoon of May 18. Mr. Bainton's reading was well-balanced and reverent, there were no attempts to show skill in handling his forces and producing effects, and yet it was treated in a free, broad manner. Three small dances by the conductor were played. The most pleasing were the unpretentious Morris Dance and Pavane, both written in a vein rather unusual to the composer. The Waltz was not so naively charming as the other numbers. Berlioz's 'Carneval Romain' overture, Stanford's first 'Irish Rhapsody,' Weber's 'Euryanthe' Overture, and the introduction to the third Act of 'The Meistersingers' completed the scheme. The orchestra showed an advance upon previous efforts, and Mr. Bainton exhibited growing powers as a conductor.

NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

The past season remained quite uneventful until towards the close, when there seemed a desire to redeem the somewhat barren policy which distinguished the opening weeks. So far the progressive policy of the North Staffordshire District Choral Society, initiated by the late conductor, is not being followed. For the first time this Society opened its season with a programme of the 'Messiah,' under its new conductor, Mr. Herbert Whittaker. The only other concert by the North Staffordshire Choir consisted of part-songs by the choir, along with vocal and instrumental solos. Mr. Herbert Whittaker again conducted.

The Hanley Glee and Madrigal Society has performed 'Elijah' and the 'Messiah.' The final concert was a performance of Berlioz's 'Damnation of Faust.' The final concert of the season given by the North Staffordshire Symphony Orchestra was distinguished by a performance of the Elgar Violin concerto, which attracted a large audience. Miss Margaret Holloway was the soloist, and received a great ovation at the close of her difficult task. Mr. Cope had laboured hard with his band of amateurs, and the large attendance was sufficient compensation for the extra labour entailed. Mr. Ernest Austin's Variations for string orchestra, 'The Vicar of Bray,' first produced under Sir Henry Wood at last seasons 'Proms,' were also given, and created an excellent impression. Mr. Cope's Society has also, from time to time, advertised forthcoming performances of Strauss's 'Ein Heldenleben,' Walford Davies's 'Everyman' and Granville Bantock's 'Sea Wanderers'—no doubt Mr. Cope will keep faith with an expectant public, and produce these promised works. All the foregoing concerts took place in the fine Victoria Hall, Hanley.

The recent initial venture of the Potteries Choral Society was thoroughly successful. In addition to the part-songs by the choir, Mr. Alfred Hollins, the celebrated blind organist, was responsible for several items including the duet for pianoforte and organ by Guilment. In this piece he was assisted by Mr. W. T. Bonner.

NORWICH AND DISTRICT.

The concluding concert of the season by the Norwich Philharmonic Society, under the conductorship of Dr. Bates, took place in St. Andrew's Hall, Norwich, on May 4, when Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic Symphony' was the principal attraction. Signor Aldo Antonietti was the solo violinist, and played Dvorák's Concerto for violin and orchestra, and four solos by Martini, Dittersdorf, Couperin, and Tartini. Mr. Plunket Greene was the vocalist, and contributed a group of songs by Schubert, Roger Quilter, and Stanford, and some folk-lore songs which greatly pleased the audience. The concert concluded with Handel's Coronation anthem, 'Zadok the Priest,' given by the Norwich Choral Society.

On April 22, Miss Margaret Prior, late Norfolk Scholar of the Royal College of Music, gave a successful violin recital, at the Assembly Rooms, Theatre Square, with the assistance of Miss Phyllis Lett as vocalist.

The last of the Saturday Popular Concerts under the auspices of the Norwich Corporation, and conducted by Dr. Bunnett, was held on April 23. During an interval, the Lord Mayor and Sheriff referred to the great success of these concerts in the past season, the attendances having been the largest in five years.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

On April 20, the Market Rasen Choral Society gave their thirtieth annual concert, when the programme consisted of 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' (Coleridge-Taylor) and Gounod's 'Faust' (concert edition). The soloists were Miss E. Shipley, Miss Fletcher, Mr. Franklin Pearson and Mr. Harold Glover. A choir and orchestra of sixty performers was ably conducted by Mr. T. W. Dunkerton.

The Welbeck Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Harry Minchin, gave a successful performance of Sterndale Bennett's 'May Queen' in the famous picture gallery at the abbey on April 25. The solos were undertaken by Miss Parker-Machon, Miss Julia Price, Mr. Franklin Taylor and Mr. William Waite.

Cowen's 'St. John's Eve' was successfully given by the Bolsover Harmonic Society on April 26. The solos were ably rendered by Miss E. Bird, Miss N. Closs, Mr. E. Clayton and Mr. H. Reynolds. Dr. Stratton conducted.

On April 28 an 'all British' band under Mr. J. Armstrong gave a successful performance at the Albert Hall, Nottingham. The programme was culled from the works of Debussy, Schumann, Dancal and Offenbach, and vocal solos were contributed by Miss Agnes Christa, Mr. Lloyd Jones and Mr. C. Keywood.

The Nottingham Glee and Madrigal Society gave a very interesting and artistic concert on May 11. The programme, selected from Brahms, Cornelius, Morley, and Elgar, was admirably carried out under the careful guidance of Mr. Charles E. Riley.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

ADELAIDE (S. AUSTRALIA).—The Bach Society, who gave two performances of Elgar's 'The Dream of Gerontius' about eighteen months ago and who were preparing to join the touring Sheffield Choir in the same work, decided to seize the opportunity of giving a separate performance. Under Dr. Harold Davies the triumphs of the original production were repeated and improved upon. The soloists were Miss Lilian Wilkinson, Mr. Robert Jones, and Mr. Murray Barlow, and the instrumental portion was undertaken by an orchestra and Mr. George Gardiner at the organ.

ARMLEY (LEEDS).—On April 25 the Armley Choral Society, which has achieved a more than local reputation by its remarkable successes in choral competitions all over the North of England, showed that its whole energy is not taken up in contests, for it gave a praiseworthy performance of the revised version of Mackenzie's 'Rose of Sharon.' The choir, prepared and conducted by Mr. H. H. Pickard, sang with splendid force, and the processional choruses made an imposing effect. It is rather strange that this seems to be the first occasion on which this well-known oratorio has been given by any Leeds society. The principals were Miss Nellie Judson, Miss Agnes Haigh, Mr. H. Brearley, and Mr. W. Hayle.

AVENING (GLOUC.).—Sir Frederick Bridge's 'The Incheape Rock' was the most important and interesting number in the programme of the concert given by the Avening Choral Society on May 11. A satisfactory performance was secured under the direction of Mr. A. W. Bruton.

BOURNEMOUTH.—The last Choral and Orchestral concert of the season was given by Madame Newling's Choir and the Municipal Orchestra on April 25. Edward German's 'Merrie England' had the advantage of an authoritative reading, as the composer himself directed the performance. The choir sang with more intelligence and purity of tone than they had ever shown before.—On May 8, at the last Classical Concert of the season, a suite entitled 'Jack and the Giant,' by C. Fairweather, was performed for the first time.

BRUTON (SOMERSET).—The annual concert of the Choral Society took place on Thursday, May 11, when a large audience gathered to hear Mackenzie's thoroughly interesting work, 'The dream of Jubal.' The solo vocalists were Miss Dorothy Spooner, Miss Primrose Gray, Mr. J. S. Perry and Mr. Latchem. The choir sang well and crisply, and the efficient orchestra, led by Miss Heginbotham and conducted by Mr. Rowland Hughes, played the accompaniments extremely well. The reciter was Miss Marjorie Somerville, who accomplished her task most successfully.

CALNE (WILTS.).—The annual concert of the Musical Society, which has been in existence for twenty-five years, was held on April 18, when the overture 'Die Verkaufte Braut' was played by the band and the 'Song of Hiawatha' (Coleridge-Taylor) was performed by the band and choir, under the conductorship of Mr. W. R. Pulein. The solos were entrusted to Madame Hilda Sands, Mr. George Brierley, and Mr. Dennis Drew. The Town Hall, in which the concert was held, was filled to overflowing.

DOVER.—On May 3, the Choral Union, under the conductorship of Mr. H. J. Taylor, gave their last subscription concert of the season in the Town Hall. The choral portion of the programme included Hubert Bath's 'Wedding of Shon Maclean,' Dudley Buck's 'Hymn to Music,' madrigals, &c. The orchestra played Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite, and the overture to 'Tannhäuser' and solos were sung by Miss Beatrice Overton, Miss Mildred Jones and Mr. Julien Henry.

DUNFERMLINE.—Sir Charles Stanford's 'The Revenge,' and Sir George Macfarren's 'May Day' were given successful performances at the Abbey Hall by the Abbey Musical Association recently. Mr. Allsopp, who conducted, secured excellent and highly creditable results from the choir, and the assisting amateur orchestra. The soprano soloist was Miss A. D. Taylor.

DUREAN (S.A.).—The Musical Association gave the second concert of the present season on April 8. The programme included 'Flora gave me' (Wilbye), 'How sweet the moonlight' (Leslie), 'Sir Patrick Spens' (Pearsall), 'The Ballad of the Clamphedown' (Bridge), and Max Bruch's Concerto in G minor for violin and orchestra. Mr. Eugen Benzon was the soloist. Mr. J. Frank Proudman conducted.

KETTERING.—Costa's now somewhat neglected oratorio 'Eli' was chosen by the Kettering Choral Society for performance on May 4, and was sung in excellent style under the direction of Mr. H. G. Gotech. The principals were Miss Mabel Manson, Master John Child, Mr. Samuel Masters, Mr. J. F. Stanbury, and Mr. A. Trayburn.

LEAMINGTON.—The Madrigal Society, conducted by Mr. E. Roberts West, gave a concert on May 4 at which admirable interpretations were given of Mackenzie's 'Midnight by the sea,' Pearsall's 'I saw lovely Phyllis,' Pinsuti's 'The sea hath its pearls,' Mr. West's specially written 'Sweet and low,' and other choral numbers.

LETHWORTH.—Handel's 'Judas Maccabæus' formed the programme of a concert given on May 10 by the Philharmonic Society of this 'garden city.' Mr. H. Gomersall conducted a performance which gave great pleasure to the audience. Miss Mary Lund, Miss Bertha Brown, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. Fred C. Wilson were the principals.

PORTMADOC.—The Portmadoc Choral Society gave their annual concert at the Town Hall on April 28, under the conductorship of Mr. J. Charles McLean, and performed Handel's 'Judas Maccabæus' and a choral fantasia on Wagner's opera 'Die Meistersinger.' The principals were Miss Rosie Jones, Miss Mollie Owen, Mr. John Roberts, and Mr. Richard Evans. The orchestra was ably led by Mr. Vasco V. Akeroyd, of Liverpool. There was a large and appreciative audience present.

QUEENSTOWN (TASMANIA).—The first oratorio performance ever given in this town took place during the autumn, when Haydn's 'Creation' was given under the direction of Professor F. G. Constantine, who had specially collected, organized and rehearsed the choir and orchestra of fifty, known as the Queenstown Philharmonic Society. The singing and playing were highly creditable, and good work was done by the soloists, Miss Irene Streader, Mr. A. G. Spening and Mr. A. B. Cruikshank.

READING.—For the purposes of a Coronation Festival Concert given at the Town Hall on May 10, the Philharmonic and Orpheus Societies, both of which are conducted by Dr. F. J. Read, were combined under his direction. The chief event was the first performance of Dr. Read's 'Ode on the Coronation Day of King George V,' which was appropriately broad and simple, and highly effective. Equally popular was Sir Frederick Bridge's, 'A Song of the English,' which the composer conducted. The remaining choral numbers were Bach's, 'A Stronghold sure,' and the seasonable 'Zadok the Priest' chorus. Miss Irene Scharrer played Schumann's A minor Pianoforte concerto, and the vocal soloists were Miss Gleeson-White and Mr. Robert Radford.

RYE.—'God, Thou art great' was excellently sung at the Rye Choral Society's concert on May 2. The choral singers acquitted themselves well, especially in the last number, and sympathetically accompanied the soprano soloist in 'Now, O earth.' They also gave a vivid performance of Stanford's 'The Revenge.' Mr. W. Sprigg Walker conducted.

SITTINGBOURNE.—For the first time the Sittingbourne and District Musical Society gave a performance of the complete cycle of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Song of Hiawatha.' The choral singing was commendably spirited and expressive; it roused the audience to great enthusiasm. Mr. W. J. Keech conducted, and the principals were Miss Clytie Hine, Mr. Albert Watson, and Mr. Joseph Ireland.

SOLIHULL.—The concluding popular concert of the Solihull Musical Society was given on May 9, when Mendelssohn's 'Psalm 13' was effectively performed, the voices being accompanied by organ and strings. This, and Macfarren's 'May Day,' were the principal works performed. Mrs. T. Cross sang the May Queen's song in charming manner. The orchestra gave Grieg's 'Two Melodies for strings,' and also two movements from Mendelssohn's 'Scotch Symphony.' The concert was given under the direction of Mr. S. Lindsay Kearne.

STOURBRIDGE.—The Worcestershire Musical Competition concluded on April 28 with a concert, the chief feature of which consisted of Mackenzie's 'Dream of Jubal,' given by the combined choirs of Astley, Colwall, Hagley, Hartlebury, Inkberrow, Kempsey, Tardebigge and Whittington. The performance of the choral portions was highly creditable, but the orchestral playing was less satisfactory. The principal solo vocalists were Miss Lucie Rosenberg and Mr. Frederick Thomas, and Mr. Charles Fry once more discharged the difficult post of reciter.

WAKEFIELD.—Choral music in this city has for some years past been in rather low water, but now a vigorous effort has been made to retrieve its position, and the first concert of the Wakefield and District Choral Society, on May 3, augured well for the success of the venture. In choosing Elgar's 'King Olaf' they showed that they aimed high, and though the orchestral force was inadequate to give full effect to the elaborate and picturesque score, a very creditable attempt was made. The choir promised well, and under Mr. Stanley A. Bligh's conductorship, sang heartily and expressively. The principals were Miss Alice Hayes, Mr. C. Nicholson, and Mr. Herbert Parker.

WORCESTER.—The Musical Society completed its nineteenth season on April 25, with performances of Joseph H. Adams's 'King Conor,' and Handel's 'Acis and Galatea.' An excellent orchestra and a well-prepared choir produced a beautiful ensemble. Both works were much enjoyed. The solos were well sung by Miss Hattie Molineaux, Mr. W. J. Otley and Mr. Percy Potter. Mr. W. Mann Dyson conducted, and is to be congratulated on an excellent concert, which should have been better patronised.

WORTHING.—On May 10, in the new Kursaal, Mr. Hawkins's Symphony Orchestra of sixty performers gave a concert to a full house. The vocalists were Mrs. Wiggins, Miss May Osborn and Dr. Densham. The chief numbers played were the Finale from Beethoven's third Symphony, and Sibelius's 'Tanz-Intermezzo' and 'Finlandia.' Mr. Horace A. Hawkins conducted.

Foreign Notes.

AMSTERDAM.

Under the conductorship of Herr Johan Schoonderbeck the Christian Oratorio Society recently gave the first performance outside Germany of Taubmann's 'Deutsche Messe,' in the presence of the composer, who was accorded an enthusiastic reception.

ANTWERP.

The last of the Nouveaux Concerts for the season was entirely devoted to Belgian composers. Commencing with Emile Mathieu's Overture 'L'enfance de Roland,' the programme included the 'Idylle mystique' (d'après le 'Cantique de Cantiques') by Jos. Ryelandt, and Peter Benoit's oratorio 'The Rhine.'

BARMEN.

The Allgemeine Konzert-Verein (conductor, Herr Hermann Inderau) terminated the season with an excellent performance of Max Bruch's choral work 'Die Glocke.' At another of the recent concerts, Wilhelm Friedemann Bach's Symphony for two flutes and string orchestra proved of more than historical interest.

BERLIN.

The Königliche Kapelle (conductor, Dr. Richard Strauss) finished the season with an excellent performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony, in which the conductor's individual interpretation showed many things in a new light.

—At the Komische Oper, Hermann Goetz's 'Die Zählung der Widerspenstigen' ('The taming of the shrew') aroused much interest on its recent revival.—On May 7, a concert was given in the Blüthnersaal in memory of the late Wilhelm Berger (conductor of the Meiningen Hofkapelle). The programme devoted to his compositions included a fine unpublished Pianoforte quartet which was performed for the first time, a number of his best songs (interpreted by Madame Julia Culp), and terminated with the E minor Variations for two pianofortes, excellently played by Professor James Kwant and Madame Kwant-Hodapp.—Herr Joseph Stransky has been appointed conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, in succession to the late Gustav Mahler.

BRESLAU.

An interesting new Pianoforte quintet by Dr. Felix Rosenthal was recently produced by the Bohemian String Quartet, with the composer at the pianoforte.

BRUSSELS.

The Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie terminated its season with a Wagner operatic festival (in German), under the direction of Herr Otto Lohse. The cast included Messrs. Van Dyck, Van Rooy, Hensel, and Knot, and Mesdames Preusse-Matzenauer, Edyth Walker, and Maud Fay. The operas chosen were 'Tannhäuser,' 'Lohengrin,' and the 'Ring.'—Other interesting occurrences have been two special performances of Gluck's 'Orphée' and Richard Strauss's 'Salome' and 'Elektra,'—Louis Delune's Violin sonata and a series of new pianoforte pieces by M. A. de Boeck figured in the programme of the fourth concert of the Société Nationale des Compositeurs belges.

COLOGNE.

Humperdinck's 'Königskinder' has been successfully given for the first time at the Opera House, where also interesting revivals of Wagner's 'Rienzi' and Heinrich Zöllner's 'Die versunkene Glocke' have also recently taken place.

DESSAU.

Weber's opera 'Euryanthe' (with the new edition of the libretto by Dr. Herman Stephan) has been revived with considerable success at the Court Opera.

FRANKFURT A/M.

Under the conductorship of Dr. Rottenberg, Humperdinck's 'Die Königskinder' was introduced at the Opera. The composer, who was present, was accorded a cordial ovation.—The Reuber Quartet performed Arnold Schönberg's highly interesting String sextet, 'Verklärte Nacht' and a Pianoforte quintet by Richard Mandl for the first time in Frankfurt.

THE HAGUE.

Her Willem Hutschenruyter (supported by the wealthy Dr. Hoogheuser), has conceived the project of building an ideal hall for the performance of Beethoven's music. This art temple has been designed by Herr H. P. Berlage, and is to be erected on the Dünen (sandhills) in the vicinity of Haarlem. To assist the undertaking, a Beethoven Festival of colossal dimensions was given recently. The proceedings, which lasted a fortnight, were inaugurated with a performance of 'Fidelio' (with mise-en-scène specially designed for this occasion), and the programmes included the nine Symphonies, and the 'Missa solennis'; the Violin concerto, and the Piano-forte concerto in G major; the Piano-forte sonatas Op. 27 No. 2, Op. 31 No. 2, Op. 57, Op. 109, 110 and 111; the Piano-forte trios Op. 70 No. 2 and Op. 97; the Violin sonatas Op. 12 No. 1, Op. 30 No. 2; the Violoncello sonatas Op. 5 No. 2, Op. 69, Op. 102 (Nos. 1 and 2); the String quartets Op. 18 Nos. 1, 2 and 6, Op. 59 (1, 2 and 3), Op. 127, Op. 130 and Op. 131; the rarely-heard Quintet for piano-forte, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon, Op. 16, and Trio for two oboes and cor anglais, Op. 87; the Sextet, and song-cycle 'An die ferne Geliebte.' The conductors were Herren Siegmund von Hausegger, Willem Kes and Henri Viotta. A number of famous vocalists and instrumentalists took part, and everything was done on a lavish scale.

KIEL.

Under the direction of the composer, the secular oratorio 'Die Heimkehr,' by Arnold Ebel, has lately been produced with success.—At the Municipal Theatre, Richard Strauss's 'Elektra' has been mounted for the first time.

LEIPZIG.

On May 7, a new three-act comic opera 'Monsieur Bonaparte,' composed by Bogumil Zepler to the libretto by Hans Hochfeldt and Hans Brenner, was produced with considerable success at the Neues Theater.—At the last Sonata recital given by Professor Julius Klengel and Herr Leonid Kreutzer, a new Sonata for violoncello and piano-forte in A major (Op. 71), by Siegfried Karg-Elert, and a 'Sonate-Ballade' by the Russian composer Michael Gnessin, were produced.

LAUSANNE.

Under the direction of M. Carl Ehrenberg, the late Gustav Mahler's fourth Symphony (with soprano solo) was played at the tenth subscription symphony concert.—Other interesting works recently performed have been Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic poem 'Antar,' Granville Bantock's overture 'The Pierrot of the minute,' and Hugo Wolf's 'Italian Serenade.'

MILAN.

The last novelty of the season at the Scala Theatre has been Paul Dukas's 'Ariane et Barbe-bleu,' which was given with great success.

PARIS.

On April 26 two two-act operas, viz., 'Le voile du bonheur,' composed by Charles Pons to the libretto of Paul Ferrier (adapted from the drama by Georges Clémenceau), and 'La Jota,' with text and music by Raoul Laparra, were produced at the Opéra-Comique.—A Beethoven Festival conducted by Herr Felix von Weingartner took place on May 2, 5, 8 and 10, the programme including all the Symphonies.—Chabrier's interesting opera 'Gwendoline' has been revived at the Grand Opéra.—At the Théâtre-Sarah-Bernhardt the Russian opera season commenced on May 2 with a performance of Dargomyjski's 'Roussalka.' On May 6, Rubinstein's 'The Demon' was given with great success.

PRAGUE.

At the Czech National Theatre, Franz Picker's three-act opera 'Maler Rainer' (libretto by Karl Naschek) has been produced under the composer's direction.

UPSALA (SWEDEN).

On May 5 and 6 a festival devoted to native music took place in the aula of the University. Among the works performed were Södermann's 'Wallfahrt nach Kevlar,' Ruben Liljefors's choral cantata 'Jungfru Maria,' choral works 'Klockorne' and 'Sekelkantate,' Drapa, 'Skärgårdsången' and Midsommervaka by Hugo Alfvén, and Stenhamner's new Piano-forte concerto in D minor.

A lecture on the 'Young British School' of composers, was given by Mr. Henry Riding, before the Metropolitan Academy Musical Union.

The Union of Graduates in Music held their annual meeting and dinner at the Criterion Restaurant on May 11. Professor Percy Buck took the chair at both gatherings. He made some interesting remarks on the existing conditions of the teaching of counterpoint. Sir Charles Stanford, Sir Walter Parratt, Dr. McClure, Dr. Pearce, Dr. T. Lea Southgate, and others, were amongst the numerous speakers at the banquet.

The School Music Review for June contains reports of the demonstration in practical musicianship given at Steinway Hall on May 11, by pupils of the Royal Normal College for the Blind; of the concerts given by the Lambeth, North West London, West London, and South-East London Choral Unions; and of the annual meeting of the Tonic Sol-fa College held at the Guildhall on May 20, with the Lord Mayor as chairman.

The annual festival will take place at Tewkesbury Abbey on September 28 next. The works to be performed are the 'Hymn of Praise' and Dr. A. Herbert Brewer's 'Song of Eden.' The choir will consist of the Gloucester and Worcester Festival Societies and the Tewkesbury Philharmonic Society. The orchestra will be drawn from London and the provinces.

On May 3 the President of the Board of Trade received a joint deputation of the Music Publishers' Association and the Society of British Composers, arranged in order to give music publishers and composers an opportunity of laying their views on the question of the mechanical reproduction of music before the President. The interview took place in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's room at the House of Commons.

The Concert-goers' Club, acting in conjunction with the Playgoers' Club, will entertain Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland at dinner at the Hotel Cecil on Wednesday, June 14, on the occasion of his retirement from the post of musical critic of The Times. Lord Alverstone, the President of the Concert-goers' Club, will be in the chair.

The scheme of the Orphan Fund for the children of musicians, founded under the auspices of the Incorporated Society of Musicians in 1897, has been revised in order to admit boys to the benefits of the Fund, and by getting rid of the incubus of rent, taxes and other charges, to devote the whole of the amount received to the children.

A number of well-known pianists have given their approval of a scheme proposed by 'A Chopin lover,' for the endowment of a bed, to be called 'The Chopin bed,' in some sanatorium or convalescent home for pulmonary complaints such as that which caused Chopin's death.

The great annual Festival of the Sunday School Choir will be held at the Crystal Palace on June 14. Mr. J. Wellard Matthews and Mr. W. Whiteman will conduct the junior and senior choirs respectively, and Mr. Wesley Hammett will conduct the orchestral numbers.

Answers to Correspondents.

JOSIE, NORTHANTS.—Two manuals and pedals are sufficient for the Bach organ sonatas. The quality of the manual stops used should be contrasted (e.g., L.H. Swell Oboe and St. Diap.; R.H., Gt. 8-ft. flute), while their power should be equal. Do not change your stops during a movement. Use 16-ft. and 8-ft. pedal, coupling to Gt. if you possess no 8-ft. pedal.

OLD SUBSCRIBER.—Your scheme for dealing with the last movement of 'Thy voice, O Harmony' is a rational one, except as regards beginning piano. The tone at first should be fairly full, and gradually increase in power to the end. But take care that the final forte is not an unmusical frenzy. Allargando, with imposing grandeur, is the idea.

A.R.C.O.—Your suggestion is excellent, and we advise the smaller antiphonal passage, B flat, D flat, C, being played on Swell.

We much regret that many answers have to be held over. Others have been answered privately.

HARVEST COVENANT

A SACRED CANTATA.

FOR SOLO VOICES (S.C.T.B.), CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

The Words chiefly selected from the Revised Version of the Scriptures.

THE MUSIC BY

A. L. COWLEY.

CONTENTS.

- No. 1.—THE CREATOR'S GIFTS.
- No. 2.—THE EVERLASTING COVENANT.
- No. 3.—THE PROMISE OF PLENTY.
- No. 4.—THE HARVEST PSALM (Psalm LXX.).
- No. 5.—THE COVENANT KEEPER.

Each number is complete in itself and suitable for separate performance. For Harvest Festivals and other special occasions the length of service can readily be arranged as required.

Twenty-two Choirs of Enfield, Enfield Highway, Winchmore Hill and District united in a performance of this work. "A splendid performance, — in every way a success.—Of the work itself we cannot speak too well,—the Cantata will rank among the high-standard musical works."—The Enfield Observer, September 30, 1910.

SEVENTH AND REVISED EDITION.

A HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS IN MUSIC CONTAINING 600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS BY ERNEST A. DICKS,

Fellow of the Royal College of Organists.

PREFACE TO THE SEVENTH EDITION.

Through the kindness of Dr. E. H. Turpin the seventh edition of the Handbook of Examinations in Music includes the latest type of Papers set by Trinity College of Music, London, in their scheme of Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge.

The work will also be found to have been considerably enlarged by the addition of fifty specimen questions, with answers. They have been designed for the most part after the manner of those set in the Theory Paper for the L.R.A.M. Diploma, and also that required by candidates for the Higher Practical Examinations held by Trinity College of Music, London. The author earnestly hopes that these additions will considerably enhance the value of the Handbook, and render it increasingly helpful to students.

TECHNIQUE AND EXPRESSION IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING BY FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or, briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

Tonic Sol-fa Edition, Two Shillings and Sixpence.

Hymns only, Imperial 32mo, Cloth Boards, One Shilling.

Hymns only, medium 32mo, diamond type, cloth, 4d. ; paper, 3d.

Complete edition, bound with HYMNS ANCIENT AND MODERN (Quarto), 6s. 6d. net.

As its name implies, this book is designed for use with, and not in place of, other Church Hymnals.For this reason the Hymns are numbered from 801, so that the numbers may not interfere with the use of any other hymn book, no other Church hymn book having as many as even seven hundred hymns. Each hymn has its own distinctive tune, and no hymn or tune in this work is found in Hymns Ancient and Modern (Old Edition), so that with the two books no duplication occurs.

The

Competition Festival Record

No. 35.

MORECAMBE.—May 16 to 20.

This great Festival held its twenty-first meeting on the above dates. Last year most of the events had to be abandoned because of the death of the late King. It is gratifying to record that this year's Festival was a great success, at least on the artistic side, and, we trust to hear, on the financial side. Besides the competitions, a strong feature of the Festival was the concert by combined choirs. These comprised a performance of 'The Creation,' under the able conductorship of Mr. J. W. Aldous (of Lancaster), of Dr. H. Walford Davies's cantata, 'Hervé Riel,' and Elgar's 'Bavarian Highlands' suite, under the experienced guidance of Mr. Harry Evans, of Liverpool.

The adjudicators were: Sir Edward Elgar, Dr. W. G. McNaught, Dr. J. W. G. Hathaway, Mr. S. H. Nicholson, Mr. Harry Evans, Mr. T. Tertius Noble, and Mr. C. H. Fogg.

The performances at the chief choral competition reached a high level. Mrs. Bourne, with the Barrow Choir, again displayed her singular genius for choir training and subtle interpretation, and Mr. Hitchon showed equal skill and artistic insight with his marvellous Habergham Choir.

The Rev. Canon Gorton, who owing to illness has been obliged to resign the presidency, contributed an interesting retrospect of the Festival to the programme book. The following are extracts:

We decided at the first instance to give prizes in money, but of such an amount that no choir was likely to enter for pecuniary gain: our scheme must be so devised that the incentive must lie in the music for competition; this must provide a thorough test, must attract and educate both choir and audience, and secondly no pains must be spared in securing the best judges, every detail being so worked out as to eliminate all fuss and worry on the day of competition. In conjunction with Dr. McNaught, a scheme of marks was decided upon. Each judge was supplied with a printed schedule. These marks and remarks were issued in a pamphlet and proved of great educational value.

Our aim was to open a School for music which should commence with sight-reading for the smallest child and have its climax in the challenge choir and full orchestra, nor should we be content until every step between these classes had been filled in. It was not our aim to be merely an examining Board. A School, as we understand it in England in the best sense, is a Society, and involves a Fellowship. We strove therefore to promote a spirit of comradeship between the various conductors, their choirs and ourselves. Any balance which we had in hand was not used to increase the value of the prizes for the winning choirs, but to assist financially, when possible, those who were specially in need of assistance.

We stand now on Pisgah heights, some of us looking backward, some looking forward. As we look back on the past and trace the path we remember chiefly the difficulties we have overcome, the friendships made in pleasant places, it is now for others to go forward seeking 'fresh woods and pastures new.' Those who join this forward march need to be thankful that they have so veteran a campaigner as Mr. John Hatch.

The following are the principal results:

The Times critic, in a very interesting summary of the proceedings on the final day, says:

Most of these have become favourite works with competitive festival committees; at least two of them, Cornelius's and Hegar's, require in very different ways extraordinary technical command for their adequate performance; and, most important of all, every one of them calls out the interpretative faculties in a remarkable degree. But since all the music had been done before, and done by certain choirs almost perfectly, it followed that one did not come to this meeting with the expectation of being thrilled with new sensations of wonder at hearing choirs from unknown places, conducted by men of no great musical reputation, achieve feats of consummate virtuosity. Every one knew that the music has been sung in the past by such choirs under such conductors, and that men who have spent their lives in music have been astonished into silent admiration by the result, so that the question was rather whether the level would be maintained.

After referring to the beautifully-finished performance of Mrs. Bourne's Barrow Mixed-voice choir in the Challenge Shield class, he goes on to refer to the Male-voice choir (tenor-lead) class:

In the male-voiced class, the competition was less keen, for one choir coming from Habbergham, conducted by Mr. E. Hitchon, went far beyond the others in perception of the meaning of the music and their power of drawing out that meaning and impressing it upon their hearers. Mr. Evans was justified in speaking of them as great artists—a phrase too often grievously abused—because they had the artist's method. It was here that they differed from the second choir, a most able one from Sale, for the latter seemed to search for what they could put into the music, while the men of Habbergham were content with what they could draw out of it. Consequently they were nowhere more wholly satisfying than in Elgar's tiny part-song, 'It's Oh! to be the wild wind,' for it will not bear the addition of a thought which the composer has not put there. There is nothing to be made of it; it must make the performance.

THE NEW STARTING-POINT.

The inclusion of this exquisite miniature in the programme of one of the biggest classes of competition seemed to point out what is the future hope for festivals such as these, and as every retrospect naturally includes a prospect, this Festival at Morecambe is a suitable moment in which to emphasise it. The time for sensations of astonishment seems to be past. Pieces of mere vivid picture-making such as Hegar's 'Phantom host' already begin to sound stale. Choirs cannot go on curdling their own blood and that of their audiences to stone, as Canon Gorton's translation puts it; the attractions of the process begin to pall. That may account for the reports which one hears that these competitive festivals have reached their limit, that it is difficult to find new test-pieces for them, and that there are no fresh fields for these singing enthusiasts of Lancashire to conquer. With such views we entirely disagree. This last Festival shows indisputably that it and organizations like it are now on the threshold of their usefulness. Now is the time, when the possibilities of brilliant choral technique have been probed to the uttermost, to go forward with the real business of artistic interpretation. It will soon become quite impossible for any choir to make an impression by means of mere technical equipment; it is almost so now. But the possibilities of artistic interpretation are boundless, and the genuineness of the movement will be tested by the desire of choirs to devote themselves more and more to it. Both the mixed and the male-voiced choirs who won on Saturday did so because they entered into the music in the spirit of artists. Some of the others did so, too, but less fully. As this becomes recognised as the only possible means of distinction, the wretched 'pot-hunting' spirit of which we sometimes hear must be killed.

The competitive festivals will probably go through difficult times in the process. We shall not be surprised to hear in a few years' time of a falling-off in the number of entries and apparent loss of keenness. But that should be only the process of separating the dross from the gold, and the survival of the movement will depend upon the amount of the gold. After hearing this Festival we are the more convinced that there is a good quantity of sound metal to be extracted.

ABERDEEN.—May 4, 5, 6, 7.

This Festival makes its appeal to the shires of Aberdeen, Banff, Elgin, Inverness, Kincardine, and Nairn. It was established in 1909, and has had widespread influence. Its operations are not confined to competitions: in fact, competition subserves other ends, and leads to much combination and co-operation. This year a children's day was instituted, and it provided some interesting experiences. The schools in the city of Aberdeen did not give the support the wholly generous object of the scheme deserved, but amends were made by the abundant entries from country districts. The sections of the competition included classes for junior choirs of varied constitution, and adult choirs of female voices, male voices and mixed voices from towns large and small, and for string and full orchestras.

In all there were twenty-five classes specified in the syllabus, and forty-three pieces were named as tests. There were no solo classes, instrumental or vocal. Such an expansion of the scheme would have involved the Festival in time-table difficulties, for as it was Dr. McNaught, Mr. Granville Bantock, and Mr. David Stephen were almost incessantly employed in dealing with the numerous competitions. Combination of resources is, as we have said, a great objective of the scheme. On the children's day this was effected by a performance of Mr. George Rathbone's musically and melodious cantata 'Vogelweid.' The work was performed with the assistance of an orchestra, and it was one of the successes of the Festival. It provided a unique experience for the country children, and must, one can imagine, have awakened in their minds many novel sensations which will influence their future attitude towards music. The organization for dealing with the children was simply admirable. It was recognised that the children must be fed, and a special committee of ladies and gentlemen dealt with this necessary business. Every child became happy by the ample provision made, and the time-table for the meals was punctually carried out. As the weather was fine the whole occasion was a happy one.

In 1909, the combined choral societies performed 'Elijah,' and in 1910 'The Messiah.' This year the adult combination had a rest, and the last day was devoted wholly to competitions. But, as in previous years, the city church choirs had their great festival service on the Sunday in the Music Hall. This service drew into a common bond 500 voices from thirty church choirs. Its organization is one of the greatest achievements of Professor Sandford Terry, and its success is a measure of the remarkable welding influence he possesses in Aberdeen. The following was the Order of Service:

Voluntary, 'A festal march' (organ and brass) David Stephen.

(Conducted by the composer.)

Psalm, 'The Old Hundredth' (Music traditionally ascribed to Claudio Goudimel.)

Prayer, offered by Rev. J. W. Coutts.

(Ferryhill United Free Church.)

'Te Deum Laudamus' (set to music in the key of C),

Sir Charles V. Stanford.

(Arranged (for brass and organ) specially by the composer.)

First Lesson—Psalm cxlviii., read by the Rev. H. A. Inglis.

(Belmont Congregational Church.)

Anthem, 'There is none that can resist Thy voice,' Ivor Atkins

(Conducted by the composer.)

Second Lesson—St. Luke, i. 46-55, read by the Very Rev.

The Principal of the University, D.D.

Eight-part Motet, 'The Lord's Prayer' C. Lee Williams.

Short sermon, by the Rev. H. D. Rawnsley, Canon of Carlisle Cathedral.

Hymn, 'O God, our Help in ages past' (tune, 'St. Anne').

During the collection, 'Feierlicher Einzug' (Investitur-Marsch), by Richard Strauss, was played.

Anthem ... 'Come, and thank Him' ... Bach.

The Benediction, pronounced by the Rev. George Walker,

B.D. (East Parish Church).

Organists: { Mr. W. T. Clemens.

{ Mr. Alexander Kidd.

Conductor: Professor Sandford Terry.

The Aberdeen Free Press contained the following admirable 'appreciation' of the Children's Day:

The Festival proceedings of yesterday will long remain a vivid memory in the minds of the 1000 and more young people who took part in the day's competitions. It was a red-letter day in their young lives. All was bustle and activity. The patter-patter of small feet, the indispensable sounds of 'throat-clearing,' the suppressed whisperings, the half-smothered sighs of mingled pleasure and anxiety were all in evidence, and helped materially in the making of a great moving picture of innocent exuberance and restrained happiness. And what a brave army it was that tramped into and out of the Ballroom and large Music Hall, with its numerous units of keenly alert little folk, all imbued with that delightful spirit of emulation that seems at once so natural and unaffected in children. The smiling faces, the bright, sparkling eyes, the restlessness that betokens excitement in the eager expectancy of coming results, all found a place in the behaviour and deportment of the little ones. And what an object-lesson it was to watch the sang-froid with which children took a defeat. There was no sign of dejection, annoyance, or disappointment. Everything was matter of fact with them, and partook largely of the 'well-it-can't-be-helped, we'll-try-to-do-better-next-time' kind of feeling. If downheartedness played any part in the day's scheme, it was never apparent in the demeanour of the young singers. What a contrast in this respect between the young folk and a similar crowd of grown-ups placed in circumstances entailing defeat!

As soon as the lesson was over, the merry little chatterboxes, throwing off their garments of demureness and decorousness, were ready to join in the hum of conversation and let loose their joyous peals of laughter. And when they applauded! Why, the best disciplined army in the world could not have punctuated the periods with greater decision and unanimity where it was found advisable by audible manifestation to 'help on' colleagues in their various competitive efforts. When they sang, too, these youthful vocalists, it was in no hesitating, half-hearted manner. They gave their whole heart to the work, and put soul into their every essay. Sometimes the tiny voices bore the impress of fatigue, and got out of tune. Then, of course, they lost pitch. But they never lost the words! It is, we know, one of the first essentials in all good singers that they enunciate clearly and distinctly. And if one thing more than another was brought forcibly to the mind of the listener yesterday, it was the manner in which the young vocalists 'gripped' and 'spoke' the words, and it also emphatically proved the tenacity with which children retain what they have committed to memory.

The Children's Day closed with a superb rendering of the cantata, 'Vogelweid the Minnesinger,' by a massed chorus of some 300 of the young choristers. The work, which is essentially tuneful and grateful to both singers and listeners, made a most fitting finale to yesterday's proceedings. The chief points of interest in the rendering—and these stood out in marked clearness—were the bright, not to say brilliant, soprano part, and the rich, full, mellow tone of the altos. The choir was composed for the most part of girls, and the ringing, fresh voices held their own with no uncertain sound against an orchestra of some forty players, together with pianoforte and organ parts.

Mr. J. M. Riach led the band with his accustomed sureness and accurate setness of purpose, and Mr. Warren T. Clemens and Mr. A. Collingwood did admirable work at the pianoforte and organ respectively. In the instrumental introduction as well as all through the cantata the instrumentalists one and all did excellent service. Dr. McNaught conducted in a manner peculiarly his own, and his magnetic influence and enthusiasm and love for the music had their successful reflex on the huge choir.

The last chorus finished amid a burst of spontaneous applause from the large audience in the Music Hall. Then the children once more stood to attention and sang a verse of the National Anthem, the soprano voices again declaiming the measures with telling effect. Thus closed the second day of the Festival, and hall-marked the complete and magnificent success of the principal innovation of the year—the Children's Day.

The following are the chief results in the competitions:

A pleasant side incident suggested by the Festival was the organization of a banquet by the local branch of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, to which the adjudicators were specially invited. Mr. J. M. Nisbet presided.

The results of the Junior Choral Competitions are reported in the School Music Review edition of the Record.

WIRRAL.—April 26.

This newly-constituted Festival, the inception of which took place in the Auditorium, Port Sunlight, obtained only moderate patronage from the public, and there were only a small number of entrants. In three classes there was no competition, and it was considered that the singing, in most cases, was far below what might have been expected from a part of the country which boasts so many amateur organizations. The adjudicator, Mr. Sydney Nicholson, considered however that the Festival for a first attempt was very creditable, having regard to the high standard set. The proceedings were brought to a close on the second evening by a vocal and orchestral concert at which Elgar's 'Coronation Ode' was sung by a choir of 120 voices, assisted by the Oxtown and Cloughton Orchestral Society.

NORTH NORTHAMPTONSHIRE.—April 28, 29.

This Festival, held in the School Hall, Oundle, was successful for the third time, attracting abundant entries and producing good results. Mr. Harry Evans, the chief adjudicator, made the following awards: Village choral societies, Barnwell. Church choirs, and Madrigal-singing (Byrd's 'The sweet and merry month of May'), Raunds Wesleyan. Mixed-voice choirs (Farrant's 'Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake'): 1st. Townley House; 2nd. Oundle Congregational. Female-voice choirs (Hatton's 'Jack Frost'): 1st. Oundle Congregational; 2nd. Raunds Cecilia; 3rd. Raunds Vicarage. Male-voice choirs (Elgar's 'The Reveille'): 1st. Oundle Avondale. In the junior competitions the successful schools were Lilford (unison, boys and girls), Bramwell (two-part, boys and girls) and Oundle (boys, unison and two-part). Mr. C. J. King judged some individual sight-singing tests. At the end of the Festival Sullivan's 'O gladsome Light,' and Handel's 'O the pleasures of the plains,' were sung by the combined adult choirs under Mr. Evans.

STOURBRIDGE (Worcestershire Competitions).

April 26, 27, 28.

This is a movable Festival, held annually with a success for which the secretary, Miss M. Bromley-Martin, is largely responsible.

We are obliged to summarize this year's results. The chief prize-winning choirs were the following:

Stourbridge Presbyterian Chapel (Mr. Arthur Woodall).

Stourbridge Institute Male-voice Choir (Mr. Harry Woodall).

Dudley Ladies' Choir (Mr. Joseph Lewis).

Newland Ladies' Choir (Mr. Bye).

Moseley Select Choral Society (Mr. Hyde).

Astwood Bank (Village choir), (Mr. A. J. Hodges).

St. Nicholas and St. Peter's Girls' Club, Droitwich, (Mr. R. A. Taylor).

Colwall Musical Society (Miss Chorley).

St. Agnes Male-voice Choir, King's Norton (Mr. A. Walker).

Miss Male's Children's Choir.

The adjudicators were Mr. Harry Evans, Dr. Sinclair and Dr. McNaught.

BURY.—March 11—13.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

The sixth Festival of this Association was held in the Drill Hall, the adjudicators being Messrs. T. Tertius Noble and R. H. Wilson. Most conveniently situated at the junction of the Irwell and Rossendale Valleys, Bury is developing the abundant material of one of the strongholds of Lancashire choralism. Almost every phase of musical art was catered for, and generally the test-pieces were chosen with much discernment, if not originality: but Elgar's 'Go, song of mine,' Bantock's 'Pibroch of Donuil Dhu,' and Hegar's 'Phantom host,' were clearly beyond the capacity of any choir likely to enter and, as a fact, the mixed-voice competition fell through, and in the male-voice class only Todmorden appeared; but though shorn of any competitive delight, this choir's singing was of a very high order. Here the vocal soloists are classified as 'bona fide amateurs' and 'those who do not earn their living by music,' a distinction most difficult either to preserve or to observe and, in any case, hardly worth the trouble; vocalists, more or less professional, have entered our chief Lancashire competitions at times, and more often than not their record has been merely 'also ran.'

The choral prizes were awarded to Bank Street Presbyterian, Bury (Dr. W. Rigby), Radcliffe Bridge Wesleyan (Mr. Edward Barnes), and Todmorden Male-voice Choir. The solo prize-winners were Miss Gwen Ellis (soprano), Miss Margaret Hudson (contralto), and Mr. J. Butterworth (bass).

SOUTH KESTIVEN, BOURNE (LINCOLNSHIRE).

April 25, 26.

This Festival was originated and energetically promoted by the Countess of Ancaster. On this occasion all concerned regretted very much the absence of her ladyship owing to the recent death of the Earl of Ancaster. It was fortunate for the Festival that its operations in former years had so favourably impressed the district with its advantage as an educational and social scheme that there was no lack of interest and support on the present occasion. The entries occupied Dr. McNaught, the adjudicator, for two whole days. Amongst the most notable of the junior choir results were the successes of Miss E. Stubble's choir, Mrs. Beaver's 'Twenty' school class, Witham-on-the-Hill school, and Morton. In a Morris dance class, which had the good fortune to be adjudicated by Mr. Cecil Sharp, Witham-on-the-Hill was again declared the winner. The Morton Council School (Mr. J. W. Palmer, head-teacher) having gained the highest aggregate marks during the day was awarded a special framed picture. The adult competition brought forward numerous village and small town choirs.

In the female-voice choir class, Mr. Stubble's choir sang with excellent effect, and Billingborough was equally successful in the male-voice class. In the choral society class, Billingborough came first, Mr. Stubble's choir close behind. The combined choirs, comprising about 350 voices, joined to give a concert performance in 'The Messiah,' under the conductorship of Mr. W. H. Wing. The singing of the choruses was remarkably good, and altogether the event was a great one for the town. Nothing on this scale had ever before been heard in Bourne.

The performance amply justified the trouble it took to organize, and it served to show what competitions plus certificates could accomplish. The soloists were Miss Margaret Gwynne, Madame Dewhurst, Mr. Fred Shaw and the Rev. R. Spurrell. The secretary of the Festival is Miss Bell, and her efforts are largely aided by her brother, Major C. W. Bell.

LEITH HILL (DORKING).—May 3.

The competing choirs in this successful little festival came from eight villages:

	Conductors.
Abinger ... ..	Mr. Hodson.
Albury ... ..	Mr. G. H. Coe.
Capel ... ..	Miss L. U. Harrison.
Coldharbour ... ..	Miss M. Vaughan Williams.
Ewhurst ... ..	Miss Clark Kennedy.
Shalford ... ..	Rev. G. Harding.
Shere ... ..	Mr. C. Whittington.
Westcott ... ..	Mrs. Carey Druce.

The chief awards were as follows: Sight-singing, Westcott; female-voice choirs (test, Brahms's 'The Nun'), Westcott; mixed-voice choirs (test, passage from Parry's 'Ode on St. Cecilia's day'): 1st. Capel; 2nd. Ewhurst. Male choirs (test, Schumann's 'Song of freedom'), Shalford. Madrigal-singing (test, Morley's 'My bonny lass'), Westcott. Dr. Percy Buck adjudicated. The Festival terminated with a concert, at which the combined choirs sang the 'Ode on St. Cecilia's day,' under Dr. R. Vaughan Williams's direction.

TROWBRIDGE.—May 2 and 3.

The new competitive meeting organized by the Wiltshire Musical Festival Association was inaugurated successfully at Trowbridge. The entries were not numerous, but were sufficient to be encouraging in a first venture, and there is every prospect that the movement will be taken up in the neighbourhood.

The following were the chief prize-winners:

JUNIOR CHOIRS.

County Secondary School, Bradford-on-Avon.
Wilton School.
Girls' British School, Bradford-on-Avon.
Church Elementary School, Heywood.
Girls' Club, Westbury.

ADULT CHOIRS.

Nunton and Odstock Choral Society.
Holy Trinity, Fonthill Gifford.
Sandford Street Congregational (two classes).
Stanton St. Bernard Ladies' Choir.
Swindon Male-Voice Choir.

The West Wilts Ladies' Orchestra were also successful. The adjudicators were Dr. Brewer and Mr. Clive Cary.

PONTEFRACT.—May 3, 4.

Dr. Walford Davies was the adjudicator at this year's Festival. His awards in the chief adult sections were as follows: (female-voice choirs) Monk Fryston; (male-voice choirs) Badsword; (madrigal) Darrington; (mixed-voice choirs) Darrington; (sight-singing) Darrington; (church and chapel choirs) Pontefract Parish Church (male) and Pontefract P.M. (mixed); (male-voice choirs) Pontefract Glee Party; (female-voice choirs) Pontefract; (chief mixed-voice class) Monk Fryston and Normanton, equal.

SOUTHPORT.—May 3—6.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

After a break of twelve months, owing to King Edward's death, the Southport Festival continued its career on May 3—6. In the interval the management has undergone some change, and the Winter Gardens has been abandoned in favour of the Cambridge Hall (in the Municipal Buildings), which possesses practically every advantage except that of accommodating a vast crowd, such as is usually found at Morecambe, Blackpool, or Preston, which are all within easy distance. The adjudicators were Dr. J. V. Roberts, Messrs. Dan Price, J. W. Ivimey, W. A. C. Crickshank, and Keighley. The Southport authorities tried the dangerous expedient of issuing a programme (excellently 'got up'), which gave the choral competitors in a certain order which was not followed owing to the introduction of a second ballot for order of singing. This led to confusion so marked that in one of the junior choral classes the adjudicators got astray and were obliged to amend their verdict an hour after having delivered it. No useful purpose can be served anywhere by such ill-advised attempts to put either audiences or judges 'off the scent' as to the identity of competitors. The mechanism of a big competitive festival is already sufficiently intricate without the addition of further complications. The male-voice entries in the 'open' classes were distinctly below Lancashire average in numbers as well as in quality, but the mixed-voice classes amply atoned for any shortcomings. The test-pieces were Fanning's 'Moonlight,' West's madrigal 'Woodmen, shepherds, come away,' and a setting in glee form by Frank Davidson (of Keighley, Yorkshire) of Wordsworth's 'O nightingale.'

There were nine choirs each on the platform for twenty minutes, so this competition absorbed practically the whole evening, and some choirs left at 10 o'clock without knowing the result. Southport came out ahead of Lancaster by two points, although Lancaster gained higher marks in two out of the three pieces; Bradford, under a new conductor, were third; and Blackpool Orpheus fourth. Southport and Lancaster tied in the sight-reading.

The reed or military band competition attracted thirteen different bodies, some regimental, others civilian. Such a combination can rarely, if ever, co-operate with choral bodies; composers of note never write for such an orchestra, consequently music used must be that composed for full orchestra 'arranged' for this particular combination, woodwind instruments replacing strings. Further, such a combination is essentially an open-air one, and cannot be heard within four walls with complete satisfaction. Band contests in the North have been conducted along such lines as to make it extremely doubtful whether much, if any, good can come of the association of such competitions with the Competitive Festival movement as we know it to-day.

We append a list of further results :

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

Tests : 'My true love hath my heart' (Cruikshank).
'The fairies' (Stanford).

- 1st. Mr. Aldous's Choir, Lancaster.
- 2nd. Orpheus Glee Society, Blackpool (Mr. Clifford Higgin).
- 3rd. Ancoats Girls' Institute (Miss Ashworth).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (second-class).

Test : 'Eldorado' (Pinsuti).

- 1st. Model Laundry Choral Society (Mr. J. V. Raffles).
- 2nd. Chorlton Road Congregational (Mr. Rupert D. Bateman).
- 3rd. Adlington Congregational (Mr. Nathan Wood).

First prizes were won by the Mendelssohn Choir (Mr. A. W. Lomas) in the alto-lead male-voice class; by Colne Orpheus (Mr. Luther Greenwood), who were the only competitors in the tenor-lead class; and by Ancoats Elementary (Miss Ashworth) in the G.F.S. and Girls' Club competition.

The chief solo prize-winners were Miss Frances Collinge and Miss Bessie Hargreaves (sopranos), Miss Nellie Hamer and Miss Emily Laycock (contraltos), Mr. Goode Pimblott (tenor), and Mr. G. H. Crosland (baritone).

DONCASTER.—May 10, 11.

This Festival is growing in importance, and is producing a steady improvement in the musical possibilities to the neighbourhood. The ready support extended to the movement by the schools of the district is one of the most gratifying and notable features.

The chief prize-winners were the following : (School sight-singing) Wheatley Park Girls' School; (large schools, unison) Felkirk Parochial; (small schools, unison) Doncaster Wesleyan Girls'; (all schools, two-part) Doncaster Wesleyan Girls'; (unison song, Bridge's 'The song of the spider') Doncaster Hyde Park boys, eleven entries; (two-part song) Royston Girls, eight entries; (Morris Dancing) Doncaster Wesleyan Girls' A (Miss Collins); (female-voice choirs, two-part) Gringley; (male-voice choirs) Doncaster; (female-voice choirs, three-part) Hallgate Free Christian Church; (church choirs) Hallgate Free Christian Church; (choral societies), 1st Bawtry, 2nd Gringley.

The adjudicators were : Mr. A. T. Akeroyd, and for the Morris Dances Mr. T. Hercy Denman.

PEOPLE'S PALACE (East London).

May 10, 12, 13 and 15 to 20.

By its rapid expansion this event has become actually a nine days' wonder, for that is the time the Festival of this year occupied. The most conclusive justification for its existence is the continued evidence that it is creating, or fostering, or bringing to light an enormous growth of choral activity in an area of East London which the competitive movement had left practically untouched previous to the existence of the People's Palace Festival. Such a result must be a source of delight and pride to the chief organizers of the scheme, Miss Edith Barran and Mr. J. McGowan. The following is a list of the chief tests, entries, and results :

 Queen's Road, Hackney, E. Commercial Centre (Mr. Walter Penn).

The results of the junior choral competitions are reported in the School Music Review edition of the Record.

At the grand concert by prize-winners and combined choirs with which the Festival terminated, the prizes were distributed by H.R.H. Princess Alexander of Teck.

The adjudicators were Mr. James Bates, Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor, Mr. T. F. Dunhill, Mr. Alfred Gibson, Dr. G. F. Huntley, and Dr. W. G. McNaught.

CHELMSFORD.

(Central and East Essex Musical Association.)

May 13 and 15.

A gratifying feature of this year's Festival was the marked improvement in the school singing, which in many cases attained a high standard. The event was admirably organized, constituting in this respect a practically perfect model.

All the competing choirs are contained in the following list:

Birch Choral Society (Rev. E. P. Luard), Broomfield Choral Society (Mrs. T. H. Waller), Chelmsford High School (Miss Spikes), Colchester Secondary School (Miss Collins) Excelsior Choir, Chelmsford (Mrs. T. H. Waller); Feering Musical Society (Miss Hunt), Georgian Choir, Chelmsford (Mr. S. J. Burrell); Great Leighs Choral Society (Mr. J. H. Newman), Hatfield Peverel Choral Society (Mrs. F. C. Bramwell and Mr. F. C. Bramwell), North Ockendon Choral Society (Miss Rachel Russell), Springfield Choral Society (Mr. F. W. Harnack), and Writtle Choral Association (Mr. E. Swan).

We append a list of the chief test-pieces and awards:

BERKS, BUCKS AND OXON.

May 13, 15, 16, 17, 18.

This highly-organized and progressive Festival was held with great success in the Public Hall, Slough. It appeals so largely to village musical organizations and receives such hearty support, that it is found necessary to subdivide the choral classes considerably, according to the population of the villages.

In the competition for Elementary School Choirs, classified according to this plan, the first-prize winners were the following:

Coteshill C.E. (Mr. Stubbings).
 Ellesborough (Mr. Arnold).
 Henley C.E. Girls' (Miss Jones).
 Langley Parish Central (Mr. Swell).
 Hedgerly C.E. (Miss Fleet), (in a 'Novice' class that attracted eleven entries).

Kendrick Girls' School, Reading (Mr. Scrivener), and Girls S.S., Henley (Miss Jones) won the first places in classes for the Junior Choirs.

The following Church and Chapel Choirs were successful:
 St. Giles's Parish Church, Reading (Mr. Scrivener).
 Beaconsfield Church (Rev. A. S. Commeline).
 Saunderton Parish Church (Rev. L. Packer).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

The Rev. B. Everett's Choir.
 Beaconsfield Chorus (Rev. A. S. Commeline).

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

Beaconsfield G.F.S. (Miss Commeline) (there were seven entries in this class).
 The Rev. B. Everett's Choir.
 Wallington Ladies' Choral Society (Mrs. B. Storer).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS.

The Rev. B. Everett's Choir.
 Brightwell Musical Society (Mr. Holloway).
 Wallington Choral Society (Mr. B. Storer).

The adjudicators were Dr. H. Walford Davies, Dr. Herbert Brewer, Mr. J. S. Liddle, Miss Fanny Davies, and Dr. R. Vaughan Williams.

The fifth annual Competitive Festival will be held at Stocksbridge in the Public Hall, on Friday and Saturday, October 6 and 7, 1911.

We regret that we are compelled to abandon or postpone our reports of competitions at Ilkley, York, Dublin, Retford, Sevenoaks, Tunbridge Wells, and other centres.

The Rev. J. B. Dykes was well known to most people as a writer of beautiful hymn-tunes, but it will come as a surprise to some to find that he had written such a large number as this volume contains.

On looking through the book one is struck by the many tunes that are known and loved by all religious-minded persons—tunes so successfully wedded to the words, that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to get on without them. . . . They are "on the lips of thousands," and are associated with the most solemn moments of life. But because Dr. Dykes was happy in expressing emotions in a way that was intelligible to the masses, we must not overlook the real difficulty and merit of discovering a musical way to the hearts of men—for not every great composer has been successful with hymn-tunes.

The world is richer for Dr. Dykes's music, and his memory deserves to be loved and honoured by all those who, like himself, strive to follow in the footsteps of the Divine Master.

COMPOSED BY

J. STAINER.

COLLECTED FROM VARIOUS SOURCES.

Price, Cloth, Gilt, 4s. 6d.

These Tunes, 161 in number, which the Composer has during the last thirty years contributed to various hymnals, or written for Choral Festivals or the use of friends, are here brought together for the first time. Many among them are new, including some Processionals of an original form.

COMPOSED BY

JOSEPH BARNBY.

Price, Cloth, Gilt, 3s. 6d.

The Hymn Tunes composed by the late Sir Joseph Barnby have made known his name wherever the English language is spoken.

In churches and chapels innumerable, as well as in countless households in Great Britain, the Colonies, and America, these simple and devotional strains have been as wings bearing upwards many a psalm and hymn and spiritual song. . . . 246 hymn tunes are here gathered together from various sources. They include both sets of his Original Tunes & Popular Hymns for use in Church and Home, in addition to those which he contributed to the Hymnary (of which he was musical editor), and other collections.

NOVELLO'S COLLECTION OF WORDS OF ANTHEMS

Crown 8vo, 822 pp., cloth, red edges, 5s. Red Basil and red edges, 7s. 6d. Appendix only, paper cover, 1s.

This Book, which now contains the words of about 2000 Anthems, besides being admirably adapted for the use of Choirs and Congregations, for which purpose it was originally compiled, will be found most valuable to Organists, Choirmasters, and the Clergy as a BOOK OF REFERENCE FOR THE SELECTION OF ANTHEMS SUITABLE FOR SPECIAL DAYS, SEASONS, OR OCCASIONS, the Indexes having been considerably enlarged. It also contains a list of Anthems suitable for Men's Voices, and Anthems with Latin words.

The newly incorporated Anthems (Nos. 1590 to 1952) have been added to the former edition by means of an Appendix, which is published separately from the complete work. Consequently Choirs and Congregations which are still using the older edition are enabled to supplement their books, and make them complete, by purchasing the Appendix at the price of One Shilling.

THE COLLEGE offers a complete course of musical instruction to pupils of both sexes, both professional and amateur, by teachers of the highest eminence in all branches. Pupils sufficiently advanced have the opportunity of putting their knowledge into practice at the Ensemble Classes, the College Concerts, and the annual performance of Opera. The College enjoys a permanent Endowment Fund, from which upwards of seventy-one Scholarships and Exhibitions are founded, which provide free musical education and in some cases a grant towards maintenance. There are also Council Exhibitions, Prizes, and other advantages, for particulars of which see the Syllabus.

An Examination for Certificate of Proficiency, with the title of "Associate of the Royal College of Music" (A.R.C.M.), is held every year. Fee, £5 5s.

TERMS, FEES, &c.

There are three Terms in the year. The Tuition Fee is £12 12s. per Term. Entrance Fee, £2 2s. Students must continue at College for at least three terms. Female Pupils requiring residence are accommodated at Queen Alexandra's House, adjacent to the College, as far as the capacity of that Institution allows, on terms to be obtained from the Lady Superintendent.

JUNIOR DEPARTMENT.

A Junior Department has been established to provide for Pupils under 16 whose time is also occupied by the necessities of their general education. The Tuition Fee is £6 6s. per Term. Entrance Fee, £1 1s.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

TENTERDEN STREET, HANOVER SQUARE.

INSTITUTED, 1822.

INCORPORATED BY ROYAL CHARTER, 1830.

Patron: HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

President: H.R.H. THE DUKE OF CONNAUGHT AND STRATHEARN, K.G.

Principal:—SIR ALEXANDER CAMPBELL MACKENZIE, M.C.S.D., LL.D., D.C.L., F.R.A.M.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC offers to students of both sexes (whether amateur or professional) a thorough training in all branches of music under the most able and distinguished Professors. In addition to receiving individual lessons in the various branches of the Curriculum, students have the advantage of attending the Orchestral, Choral, and Chamber Music Classes, and the weekly Lectures on music and musicians. Evidence of their progress is given at the Fortnightly and Public Concerts and by periodical Operatic and Dramatic Performances.

There are three Terms in the Academic year—viz., the Michaelmas Term, from Michaelmas to Christmas; the Lent Term, from early in January to Easter; and the Midsummer Term, from early in May until the end of July.

The Fee for the ordinary curriculum is 11 Guineas per Term.

A large number of Scholarships and prizes are founded and are competed for periodically.

Students who show special merit and ability receive the distinction of being elected by the Directors Associates of the Institution, and are thereby entitled to the use after their names of the initials A.R.A.M. Students who distinguish themselves in the musical profession after quitting the Institution may be elected by the Directors Fellows of the Royal Academy of Music and are thereupon entitled to the use after their names of the initials F.R.A.M.

Subscribers have the privilege of attending the Lectures and Public Concerts and of introducing friends in proportion to the amount of their subscriptions.

An examination of persons trained independently of the Academy is held twice a year—viz., during the Summer and Christmas vacations—successful candidates at which are elected Licentiates of the Academy, and are thereupon entitled to the use after their names of the initials L.R.A.M. The Syllabus is issued annually at Easter. Last day for entry for the September Examination, June 30; for the Christmas Examination, October 31.

An examination of persons engaged in the Training of Children's Voices is held in September and during the Christmas Vacation, and a certificate is granted to successful candidates.

Prospectus, entry form, and all further information may be obtained on application.

At an early date the work of the Academy will be removed to the new building in the Marylebone Road, now rapidly approaching completion. The date of removal will be duly announced in the daily advertisements of the R.A.M. in the Daily Telegraph, The Times, and also in various musical publications.

THE Board holds Examinations throughout the United Kingdom and in the Colonies in both Theoretical and Practical Music. The Examinations are of two kinds, "Local Centre" and "School." The Local Centre Examinations are carried out by two Examiners chosen almost exclusively from the Staffs of the Royal Academy of Music and of the Royal College of Music. The School Examinations are conducted by one Examiner.

The Subjects for Examination are comprised in the following list:—

PRIMARY THEORY.
RUDIMENTS OF MUSIC.
HARMONY AND GRAMMAR OF MUSIC.
COUNTERPOINT.

PIANOFORTE.
ORGAN.
VIOLIN.
VIOLA.
VOLONCELLO.

DOUBLE BASS.
HARP.
WIND INSTRUMENTS.
SINGING.

LOCAL CENTRE EXAMINATIONS (Syllabus A). Examinations in Theory held in March and November at all Centres. In Practical Subjects in March—April at all Centres; and in the London district and certain Provincial Centres in November—December also. ENTRIES for the November—December Examinations CLOSE WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1911.

SCHOOL EXAMINATIONS (Syllabus B) held three times a year: viz., October—November, March—April, and June—July. ENTRIES for the October—November Examinations CLOSE WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1911.

These Examinations are of graduated difficulty, so as to provide a complete series of tests from the Primary Division School to the Advanced Grade Local Centre Examination, suited to Candidates of all degrees of proficiency.

Theory Papers set in past years (Local Centre or School) may be obtained from the Central Office, price 3d. per set, per year, Post-free.

The Board offers annually SIX EXHIBITIONS tenable at the Royal Academy of Music or Royal College of Music for two or three years. These Exhibitions are limited to Candidates under twenty years of age who fulfil certain conditions set forth in each Syllabus.

THE NOVELLO CENTENARY,

1811-1911.

This year being the centenary of the foundation of the House of Novello & Co., we believe it to be an appropriate occasion for giving our readers a survey of the history of the firm and of its activities, more especially as we think we can claim, without any undue pretension, that the history of the house of Novello is to a large extent the history of music in modern England. The past hundred years have seen an enormous growth in the appreciation and cultivation of music in every form in this country. We may not have progressed in all directions as far as we could wish—in operatic matters particularly England has still a lot of ground to make up; but as regards orchestral and choral music, domestic music, and the music of the church, the improvement has been a remarkable one. Not the least gratifying feature of the history of the century is the rise of a native school of composition that both in its best and in its average work can for the first time bear comparison with those of other countries. In this development Novello & Co. have played a leading part; by the variety, the quantity, the quality and the cheapness of their publications they have largely helped to spread that knowledge of and desire for music without which composers must strive in vain for a hearing; while a mere glance at their catalogues will show how much they have done, in each generation, to bring the representative composers of the day into touch with the public, and to encourage a native school

The history of a great publishing House is shown forth in its publications; and these, when they extend over a sufficiently long period of time, are a record not only of the business activities of a few individuals, but of the habits and the culture of a nation. Each factor acts and reacts upon the other. Without the vast commercial and social developments of Victorian England, especially the rise of the middle class, the amelioration of the condition of the working classes, and the general improvement in machinery and the means of communication, a purely artistic business such as that of Novello & Co. could not have grown to its present size. On the other hand the firm can justly claim that they have made the demand for good music rather than merely satisfied it; they created the appetite it has been their duty and pleasure to feed. From the beginning they led English musical opinion instead of following it. There is not a department of English musical life of which it cannot be said that it would have been poorer to-day but for the labours of Vincent Novello and his successors—labours often performed with far more disinterestedness, far less regard to the purely commercial aspect of a question, than is usually attributed to or expected of a large and successful business house. The full force of the record, however, can only be felt when we bear in mind the musical conditions in England before the firm began its activities; and to place the general reader in possession of these facts will be the first purpose of this survey.

No words could better express the ideal of the firm during the whole of the past century than those in which Mrs. Mary Cowden-Clarke, in the biography of her father, Vincent Novello, sums up the work of that pioneer—‘one who ‘has done perhaps more than any other single ‘individual towards spreading a love and ‘cultivation of the best music among the least ‘wealthy classes of England.’ That pioneer work was often done under serious difficulties; not only had the usual—nay, more than the usual—business risks to be taken, but the press laws were a serious hindrance for a time, the short-sighted policy of the printing trade in the first half of the last century also acted occasionally as a drag on the wheel, and even some of the classes whom it was proposed to benefit found cause for suspicion in the very cheapness and serviceability of the early publications of the House! That these and other difficulties were over-ridden was due to an exceptional combination of idealism and practical capacity in the successive rulers of the House. It is this combination that makes the story of Vincent Novello’s life and work so interesting to-day.

VINCENT NOVELLO.

Vincent Novello, the son of an Italian father and an English mother, was born in London on September 6, 1781. From his earliest years he lived in an atmosphere of music, though the ‘only direct instruction’ he ever received in the art was said to be some pianoforte lessons, when a child, from one Signor Quellici, a friend of his father. As a choir-boy at the chapel of the Sardinian Embassy, in Lincoln’s Inn Fields, however, he had plentiful opportunities for picking up both practical and theoretical knowledge. The organist at the chapel was Samuel Webbe, senior, and with him and Danby, the organist at the chapel of the Spanish Embassy, in Manchester Square, the boy became very intimate. He sometimes acted as deputy for them, and at the early age of sixteen became organist at the Portuguese Embassy’s chapel in South Street, Grosvenor Square. In 1812 he added to this activity those of pianist and conductor to an Italian operatic troupe performing at the Pantheon, Catalani being one of the stars. He received an offer from George the Fourth of the post of private organist at the Pavilion, Brighton; but this he declined. His musical education and capacities must have been far above the average of his day, even among professional musicians. He was singer, composer, conductor, organist, and choir trainer; he was also a skilled performer upon the viola, and had a practical knowledge of organ building. From 1840-1843 he was organist at Moorfields Chapel. He was one of the founders of the Philharmonic Society (1813)—the concerts of which he sometimes conducted—of the Classical Harmonists’ Society, and of the Choral Harmonists’ Society,—the two latter organizations being formed for the cultivation of vocal and instrumental music. He died at Nice on August 9, 1861, in the eightieth year of his age. Of his eleven children, the best known to posterity are Mary—who married Mr. Charles Cowden-Clarke,—Joseph Alfred, who assisted and succeeded his father in the publishing business—Clara Anastasia, the famous singer (1818-1908), who married Count Gigliucci—and Mary Sabilla, who was also a singer for a time.* Vincent Novello numbered among his friends not only many of the leading musicians but some of the most distinguished literary men of the time, including Charles and Mary Lamb, Keats, Shelley, Leigh Hunt, and Hazlitt. An admirable description of an evening ‘at the house of my good Catholic friend Not—’ will be found in Lamb’s ‘Chapter on Ears,’ in the Essays of Elia.

Vincent Novello was early struck by the paucity of good music published in England, and he never lost an opportunity of making copies of manuscript music with a view to future publication. In his early days he had access to the large musical library of the Rev. J. C. Latrobe; here he copied some of the

* In the recently published volume of ‘Clara Novello’s Reminiscences’ her daughter, the Contessa Valeria Gigliucci, finds an explanation of the ability and energy of the Novello family in its comprehensive ancestry. Vincent Novello himself was half English, half Italian; his wife, Mary Sabilla Helm, was the daughter of a German father and an Irish mother. ‘The theory, generally accepted,’ says the Contessa, ‘that the fusion of races produces fine specimens of the human plant, was singularly verified in the Novello family. Endowed with splendid health, and an unusual fund of physical staving powers, they each and all possessed intellectual and artistic gifts of no mean order, and distinguished themselves all in greater or lesser degree. Mary Cowden-Clarke in letters, authoress of many works, chief of which, the ‘Complete Concordance of Shakespeare’ she began at nineteen years of age, and continued uninterruptedly to its completion, for nineteen more; Alfred in commerce, founder together with his father of the publishing house Novello & Co., and pioneer of cheap music—this not so much with a view to money-making, which was a rather unexpected result, but from his intense love of music and belief in its refining influence, which benefit he wished extended to the poorer classes, cheap music promoting choir and part-singing; Edward and Emma in painting; Cecilia on the stage; Clara in vocal art; Sabilla in music and letters. Their industry, inherited in equal measure from both parents, was quite exceptional,—efficiently industrious, as a friend once truly characterized them. This unwavering industry was doubtless one of the principal factors of their success in life. Their practical views, clear perception of worldly advantages and how best to secure these, were curiously blended with a complete indifference to money when possessed, with lofty ideals in art, and an unworldliness often bordering on childlike simplicity.’

Masses of Haydn and Mozart, which he afterwards edited and published. By incessant industry and prudent economy of time he managed to do a great deal of work of this kind, even in the thick of his many other occupations as teacher, organist, &c. His daughter, Mary Cowden-Clarke, tells us that 'that which has been printed and given to the world is scarcely a third of the manuscripts he made.' 'His editing,' she continues, 'generally implied re-writing the whole work, voice-parts as well as separate accompaniment, 'which he himself added.' In one well-known case his eagerness and habit of wasting no time saved the world from an irreparable loss. At the York Musical Festival of 1828 he obtained permission to make copies of four of Purcell's anthems and the Evening Service in G minor. On applying to a copyist he was told that the series would take three weeks to transcribe; the next morning this was extended to five weeks, but Novello in the interval had copied the whole of the works himself. Shortly after, the original manuscripts were destroyed in a fire at the Minster; so that but for Novello's promptitude they would have been lost for ever. He had now the satisfaction of being able to present the Minster with a copy of his own.

VINCENT NOVELLO'S EARLIEST PUBLICATIONS.

Vincent Novello's earliest publications were works intended for the Catholic service, primarily in the Chapel of the Portuguese Embassy, at which he was organist. He began in May, 1811, with 'A Collection of Sacred Music,' in two folio volumes; among the works were several written by himself.* He was driven to have them engraved at his own expense by the fact that no publisher could be found to take the risk of bringing them out. Moreover the public taste for such works had to be made by giving regular performances of them. Novello was probably not the first to print an accompanist's part to choral music, instead of the mere figured bass, but he was certainly among the first to do so; and it stands on record that he was censured for it by many of the organists of the day, who probably felt that a valuable trade secret was being given away to the common herd. His second publication was 'Twelve Easy Masses for Small Choirs,' in three volumes, in 1816. This was followed in 1822 by 'The Evening Service, being a collection of pieces appropriate to Vespers, Complin and Tenebræ, including the whole of the Gregorian Hymns for every principal festival throughout the year,' in 2 volumes (twelve books). His next undertaking was in connection with the Masses of Haydn and Mozart. At that time only fifteen of these were accessible to the public—eight by Mozart and seven by Haydn,—and these only in full scores printed abroad, without separate organ accompaniment. Drawing upon the manuscript possessions of libraries and private owners,—including those of Prince Esterhazy—Vincent Novello was able to issue, by the end of 1825, eighteen Masses by Mozart and sixteen by Haydn, in vocal score, together with the orchestral parts. The same year saw the issue of five volumes of Italian selections from the manuscript music in the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge, which collection the authorities had asked him to examine and report upon in 1824; pieces were included by Bononcini, Carissimi, Clari, Colonna, Durante, Jomelli, Leo, Vittoria, Martini, Orlando di Lasso, Palestrina, Pergolesi, Stradella, and others. Writing after his death, in 1861, Mrs. Cowden-Clarke said that the portions published represented only about a third of the transcripts made by her father; sufficient copies remained to fill another ten volumes. In December, 1828, Vincent Novello commenced the publication of 'Purcell's Sacred Music,'—his first issue of other than Catholic music. This work was completed in 1832 in five volumes (seventy-two numbers) by his son Joseph Alfred (born 1810), who had begun as a publisher in 1829 at the new residence of the family, 67, Frith Street, Soho.* The collection had been gathered together from all sources, and contained many pieces that had not hitherto been published. To the last number was added a 'Life of Purcell' by Vincent Novello. (Ten years later (1842-1844) the work was re-issued in four volumes, in the same format as the publications of the Musical Antiquarian Society.) Still pursuing the same line, the House added to its publications a collection of pieces for treble voices, entitled 'Convent Music' (2 vols., 1834); a collection of Psalm tunes, entitled 'The Psalmist'; 'The Congregational and Choristers' Psalm and Hymn Book'; Croft's Anthems (2 vols.); Greene's Anthems (2 vols.); Boyce's Anthems (4 vols.); organ and vocal parts of Boyce's 'Cathedral Music' (1842), and Masses by Beethoven and other composers. Another curious instance of unreasoning conservatism is afforded by the objection of choirs to sing from the separate vocal parts issued by the firm; and we are told that 'the neatly-engraved oblong editions of the Masses of Haydn and Mozart, which were given to the world at what was then a very cheap rate—the cost . . . ranging from two shillings to nine and sixpence, each Mass being priced according to size—were looked upon with suspicion, as representing a somewhat dangerous form of revolution in the musical world.'

* 'Most of the following pieces,' he says in his preface to the volume, 'were written at different intervals for the sole use of the Portuguese Chapel, and without any view to future publication; but from their having been found not ill-adapted to the powers of a small choir, and more particularly in consequence of the very great scarcity of similar productions, so many applications were made from persons who were desirous of possessing copies, that I at last resolved to alter my original intention and to publish them . . . . The manner in which this work has been encouraged has so far exceeded my most sanguine expectations that should I prove so fortunate as to obtain the approbation of the subscribers I may probably at some future period endeavour to form (from the quantity of manuscript materials still in my possession) another addition to the very scanty stock hitherto published of music adapted to performance in a Catholic chapel.'

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE MUSICAL TIMES.

In 1834 the family had removed to No. 69, Dean Street, which remained the publishing office of the house of Novello until 1868. It was from there that the first number of the Musical Times was issued, on June 1, 1844. (We gave a facsimile of this first number as a supplement to our Jubilee number, June 1, 1894.) The journal was born at the moment when an interest in choral music was springing up in many parts of England, largely through the efforts of men like Mainzer and Hullah. In Paris, in the early years of the 19th century, one Guillaume Wilhelm had inaugurated a new system of collective music teaching, mainly for the benefit of school children and of working people. His idea was taken up by Joseph Mainzer, a German musician, who, after much wandering, had come to live in England, settling in Manchester in 1847. While Mainzer was training the people in collective classes in the north, Hullah had been doing the same work in London since February, 1841. The leading article of the first number of the Musical Times laid stress upon the fact that twenty years previously 'the execution of concerted and choral music in private was almost unknown,'—partly from the difficulty of obtaining music, partly from the scarcity of singers. The Classical Harmonists' Society † was founded in 1833 to remedy this latter defect, but for many years it could not muster the requisite twenty members 'willing and able to take a part.' During the next ten years matters improved in this respect, and by 1844 there were more than twenty societies of the kind in London. The movement for teaching the people to sing and giving them an interest in music was warmly supported by philanthropists and temperance reformers, Father Mathew being one of its most ardent advocates. But it could never have developed as it did without a constant supply of good and cheap music. It was this supply that Alfred Novello set himself to maintain. In the opening number of the Musical Times reference was made to 'a very important contribution to the cause of good music,'—the commencement of the publication of a series of 'Cheap Classics,' including in its early issues Spohr's 'Last Judgment' and Masses by Mozart and Haydn—and to the publication of the concluding numbers of Boyce's collection of Cathedral music, in vocal score and in separate vocal parts. 'Choral societies,' it was announced, 'can now perform some of the services produced by the great English cathedral writers, which previously to the present publication were sealed books.' In almost all churches except a few of the cathedrals the musical portion of the service was meagre and poor; it was mostly left to badly trained or untrained charity children, whose singing is pleasantly described in this first number of the Musical Times as a 'horrid infliction.' It is thus evident that without the bold line taken by Vincent and Alfred Novello in making good music accessible to people of moderate means, this country would have had to wait much longer for the improvement in the quality of the church service and of choral singing generally. Their policy was frequently regarded by other music publishers as a rash one; and judging from an announcement in the first number of the Musical Times that a new oratorio, 'The Deliverance of Israel,' by Mr. William Jackson, of Masham, was being published in monthly parts (!), the normal public demand for music could not have been large.

* 'A very modest beginning, in appearance,' says Mrs. Cowden-Clarke—'a couple of parlour windows and a glass door, with a few title-pages bearing composers' names of sterling merit, and Vincent Novello as editor; but conscientious faith in promoting the diffusion of the best music on the part of him who edited, and industry, punctuality, and zeal on the part of the young publisher . . . made that original simple parlour shop the germ of the mart for supplying England—nay, the world—with highest-class music.'

† The better-known Sacred Harmonic Society was founded in 1832.

It was the great merit of Vincent and Alfred Novello that by furnishing a large supply of good music they created a demand for it all over England. This demand was stimulated and existence, not only cheap music but expert practical advice. 'The culture of music,' Miss Sabilla Novello wrote in 1894, 'has wrought incalculable good among the working guided by the tours which Alfred Novello used to make in furtherance of his business and of his ideal, particularly in the crowded artisan districts of Lancashire and Yorkshire; he could give the mill or factory hands, eager to form themselves into choirs or to improve a choir already in 'classes, where its beneficent effect may be most palpably traced. This great reform was recognised and made possible by my brother, Alfred Novello, the "inventor," as he is rightly called, of cheap music. Forty years ago the startling novelty of printing

'first-rate compositions at the price of a few pence was resented by some music publishers as a mischievous innovation, and was laughed at by others as a philanthropic but unfeasible scheme.' The working men took a different view; as one of them put it to Alfred Novello, the procuring of 'a bit of music' was now a matter not of pounds or shillings, as it used to be, but simply of giving up 'a pot of beer'; and they were grateful to the 'cheap music chap,' as they called him, for what he had done for them.

The full title of the Musical Times, it will be observed, still includes also the words 'and Singing Class Circular.' This embodies a bit of literary history. In August, 1841, Joseph Mainzer began to issue a small sheet, the National Singing Circular, to assist in the propagation of his ideal of popular singing. Published at first at irregular intervals, it became so eagerly taken up that Mainzer resolved to regularise its issue and enlarge its scope; it was to be a 'regular musical journal, published at stated intervals, and conducted on a broad and extended plan.' The first number of this new paper,—Mainzer's Musical Times and Singing Circular—was issued on July 15, 1842. Part of the scheme was the inclusion of a piece of music in each number. Alfred Novello published for Mainzer, and in 1844 he took over the Musical Times from him, the last number of the old issue appearing on May 1, and the first of the new issue on June 1; the journal, by the way, had by this time shrunk from sixteen pages to eight, and it was with the latter number that it began under its new proprietor. The form and size of the old issue were retained, as well as the plan of the inclusion of a piece of choral music monthly. That given with the first number was Purcell's 'In these delightful, pleasant groves.' The journal was 'printed by Thomas Richards, 100, St. Martin's Lane,' and 'published by J. Alfred Novello at 69, Dean Street, Soho.'

ALFRED NOVELLO BECOMES HIS OWN MUSIC PRINTER.

The determination to maintain the octavo size for both the Musical Times and the musical supplement soon brought Alfred Novello into collision with the printing trade. Almost all sheet music at that time was printed from engraved plates. The method of printing by means of separate types was of course well known, and in this method Messrs. Clowes, the English printers, had effected several improvements in the early part of the 19th century. The rules of the composers' trade union worked oppressively, making the cost of setting up type in connection with music twice that of setting up the same quantity in the ordinary way. The printers could not relax their rules for so small an order as the Musical Times amounted to at first; and as Alfred Novello's prophetic insight into the possibilities of his scheme made it impossible for him to abandon it, he was in time compelled to embark upon a new business,—that of the type music printer. The trade union gave way after a three years' struggle, but by that time (1847) Alfred Novello had begun on his own account, employing non-unionist men. He effected several improvements in the appearance of the music type, and was soon able not only to print his own publications but to undertake work for other publishers. The well-known format of the octavo editions of the house of Novello, it may be added, was suggested and determined by the size selected for the Musical Times and its supplements. Of these latter, a secular and a sacred composition were issued alternately. The new venture was greeted kindly after its sixth number by a slightly older paper, the Musical World, dating from 1836, which referred to it, not without a touch of patronage, as 'a very unpretending publication, but one of considerable merit and utility.' It noted as 'the principal feature' of the journal 'a composition in vocal score—'a glee, madrigal, or chorus, as the case may be—adapted peculiarly to the singing classes so much in vogue. Purcell, Winter, Festa, Weber, Beethoven, Novello, Spofforth, &c., have already been drawn upon. The 'price of the work,' it went on '(three-half-pence), leaves us no cause for surprise at the circulation which it has already attained—a circulation, we believe, little short of three thousand.' Thus from the beginning was vindicated Novello's policy of supplying the man of ordinary means with music at once cheap and good.

STRUGGLE AGAINST THE 'TAXES ON KNOWLEDGE.'

Before pursuing further the history of the firm and of the Musical Times, a word or two may be said on the struggle against the 'taxes on knowledge,' in which Alfred Novello played a very prominent part. These taxes—the excise duty on paper, the stamp tax upon newspapers, and the tax upon advertisements—weighed heavily and vexatiously on the press. Alfred Novello especially felt their burden; on the number for April, 1852 alone, he tells us, he had to pay taxes amounting to £24 10s. 10d.; and in 1850 we find him petitioning the House of Commons, through Mr. Milner Gibson, on the subject. From the mere fact that he had found it convenient to publish his cheap oratorios in numbers containing sixteen pages each with a wrapper round them to keep them clean, the catalogue of his publications became liable to the advertisement duty simply because these wrappers bore a date, although books published with a catalogue bound with them were not liable; 'and if, for the better arrangement of the catalogue, dividing rules are used between the works enumerated, then separate duties are charged.' There was further trouble on account of the Musical Times. This was published at three-halfpence, or—stamped for transmission through the post—twopence-halfpenny. This latter practice, however, brought the proprietor under the operation of the Newspaper Act, which required him to enter into recognisances to the amount of £1,200 not to insert a libel in the journal—'an offence,' as Alfred Novello said in his petition, 'which the nature of the work renders scarcely possible, and for which offence there are remedies, should the offence be committed.' Other grievances were enumerated, especially the excise duty on paper; and the petition wound up with a practical suggestion that seems rational enough now, though perhaps excessively daring to many politicians of that day: 'Your petitioner therefore prays that the excise tax on paper, the tax upon advertisements, and the stamp tax upon newspapers may be abolished, leaving the authorities to fix a small charge for the transmission of newspapers by post.' Five years later the Government had again to take notice of the Musical Times; one official had threatened it with prosecution because, being a newspaper, it should have been printed on stamped paper, while another department meant to confiscate the journal and send it to the Dead Letter Office because, not being a newspaper, it ought to have been folded otherwise than it was! The outcome of all this agitation and discussion was the repeal of the advertisement duty in 1853, of the newspaper stamp in 1855, and of the paper duty in 1861. Alfred Novello's services in the long struggle for emancipation brought the suggestion of a knighthood from Mr. Milner Gibson; but the proposed honour was declined.

ALFRED NOVELLO REDUCES THE PRICE OF HIS PUBLICATIONS.

In face of all these difficulties it required some courage on the part of Alfred Novello to reduce the price of his musical publications in 1849, most of them to the extent of fifty per cent. He gave his reasons in a frank and straightforward circular addressed to the public, in which he pointed out—giving figures of cost of production to support his argument—that if a publisher could count on greatly multiplying his sales he could afford to reduce his prices. It was his hope that 'although the reduction of the prices . . . will entail much the same risk as that incurred by the earlier editions of classical music,' yet 'the diminished cost, by the impetus it will give to 'the cultivation of music, will again have the effect of creating fresh buyers in addition to those which already exist.' The venture was soon justified by its success; it was everywhere commended in the press, and no less than twenty thousand copies of the 'Messiah' alone were quickly sold. Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' had been issued in a cheap edition in 1848* in twelve monthly numbers of sixteen pages each, price sixpence per number; this also was now brought out in a still cheaper form, and was followed by 'Israel in Egypt.' A few years later (1854) the octavo score of the 'Creation' was reduced to three shillings, and the 'Messiah' and 'Judas Maccabæus' were issued at four shillings each. The success of the scheme had already forced other publishers to bring out their own editions of oratorios at the same prices; the celebrated Peters edition, for example, 'was confessedly based upon the inventions and suggestions made by the House of Novello.'

GROWTH OF THE FIRM.

All this while the business of the house had been growing in all directions. In February, 1848, the Musical Times was enlarged to twelve pages; while in November, 1849, an announcement was made of its 'permanent enlargement' to sixteen pages. When the word 'permanent' was penned, the writer could not foresee the great development the paper would undergo in the next three or four decades; the number of the pages in an average edition of the present year—including the advertisements and musical supplements—is about seventy. By 1859 the circulation had increased to 10,500, and by 1870 to 14,000. In January, 1868, it was enlarged,—again 'permanently'—to thirty-two pages, the price being raised from three-halfpence to twopence. Nine years later—in January, 1877—the paper was expanded to forty-eight pages, and the price raised to three-pence. Six months before this, the City office of the house had been removed from the Poultry to 80 and 81, Queen Street, Cheapside.

Within the firm itself a number of changes took place from time to time. In January, 1857, Alfred Novello retired, after a strenuous business life of twenty-seven years. He went to live first at Nice, then at Genoa, where he died on July 16, 1896. On his retirement the control was left in the hands of Mr. Henry Littleton (born 1823), who had entered the service of the firm in 1841, and had quickly risen to the highest position in it under Alfred Novello. In 1861 Henry Littleton was admitted to partnership, and the title of the firm became 'Novello & Co.' Five years later Alfred Novello entirely severed his connection with the business, Mr. Littleton becoming sole proprietor. In 1867 he purchased the business of Ewer & Co.* He had had the entire management of the business in his hands for many years. When it became his own he was careful to carry it on in the spirit of his predecessors—with the same insight, the same energy, the same view to the general advancement of music. The later survey of the activities of the publishing department and of the Musical Times will make manifest the breadth of mind and the steadfastness of purpose that animated the House of Novello under Mr. Henry Littleton's régime.

Novello & Co. were already the publishers of certain of Mendelssohn's works—'St. Paul,' the 'Hymn of Praise,' and the first two books of the 'Lieder ohne Worte,' the latter, by the way, being 'published for the author.' The purchase of the business of Ewer & Co. brought the firm into possession of a number of other Mendelssohn copyrights, including 'Elijah,' 'Athalie,' 'The Walpurgis Night,' and 'Hear my Prayer,'—as well as many other works, and a large circulating library of music. The increased operations of the House necessitated the removal of Novello, Ewer & Co. to No. 1, Berners Street, in December, 1867; but as even these premises were soon found to be too small for all the departments of the business, the printing part of it was removed to 69, Dean Street (the previous publishing office of Alfred Novello); later on, No. 70 was added. Berners Street soon became a recognised preserve of the music trade. When Novello, Ewer & Co. went there in 1867 there was only one other music house to bear them company; when they left there were more than fifty. In 1878 the firm opened large bookbinding establishments of its own at 111 & 113, Southwark Street, No. 115 being added shortly afterwards. On the expiration of the lease, in 1906, the Berners Street premises were abandoned for the present building in Wardour Street. This is a handsome structure erected from the designs of Mr. Frank Loughborough Pearson, F.R.I.B.A. The expressed intention of the Directors was to have not merely a building 'for the practical working and development of the business,' but one 'which should constitute in some degree a tribute to the art of music, and at the same time . . . stand as a memorial to their predecessors who laboured so earnestly for the progress and ever-widening influence of that art in this country.' The premises, which are held on a Crown lease, cover more than half an acre. The building is in the Renaissance style. Perhaps the most striking feature of it is the magnificent and spacious Hall—44 feet by 36 feet, and 24 feet high—with its chimney-piece of Pavanazza marble, its beautifully carved oak overmantel, and its rich, harmonious scheme of decoration. It is in this Hall that the retail part of the business is carried on,—and nowhere, surely, can a business be conducted under more artistic conditions. The effect of the Hall on those who enter it for the first time is well-expressed in the involuntary ejaculation of one of the leading English musicians—'What an uplifting place!' Another interesting feature of the building is Roubiliac's celebrated Vauxhall statue of Handel, executed in marble in 1739; this was purchased from the Sacred Harmonic Society by Mr. Henry Littleton, and eventually presented to the Company by Mr. Alfred H. Littleton, the Chairman of the Board of Directors.

Mr. Henry Littleton retired at the beginning of 1887, and died on May 11, 1888, his sons, Mr. Alfred H. Littleton and Mr. Augustus J. Littleton and his sons-in-law, Mr. George T. S. Gill and Mr. Henry W. Brooke, succeeding him. In 1898 the business was formed into a private limited company, under the title of Novello & Co., Ltd., with Mr. H. R. Clayton as Secretary. For some years past the plant of the firm had been so enlarged as to make it capable of undertaking not only musical work but any kind of printing—books, periodicals, newspapers, &c.—and lithographing; and with the exception of the actual manufacture of the paper needed, the whole of the many processes in connection with the issue of each one of the firm's publications are in its own hands. With a view to making its musical issues equal in beauty and legibility to the best that could be produced in Germany, a number of expert engravers were brought over from Leipsic. The scores of Novello have for thirty years past been able to bear comparison with those of any other house in the world.

About 1850, Alfred Novello formed the plan of establishing a New York branch, in consequence of the increasing demand for his publications in America. An assistant was sent from London to manage the branch. In 1871 a new music store was opened at 751, Broadway, New York, 'the rapid growth of musical taste in America necessitating this step.' In 1906 the business of the New York House was handed over to the H. W. Gray Co.

BOOK PUBLICATIONS.

A glance at the book catalogue will show that the firm has done great service not only to practical music in England but to musical education. An important beginning was made in 1852 with a reprint, in ten monthly parts at 3s. 6d. each, of Sir John Hawkins's 'General History of the Science and Practice of Music.' The whole of the original text was printed, and nothing was omitted of the illustrative woodcuts, the musical examples, or the facsimiles of ancient manuscripts. This cheap edition, in itself a boon to the student in days when good musical literature was scarce and expensive, was further enriched by the insertion of the notes made by Hawkins in his own copy of the 'History,' now in the British Museum. A new edition of the work was issued in 1875. The year 1852 saw also the commencement of a valuable series of instruction books,—'The Library for the Diffusion of Musical Knowledge.'

'Treatise on Counterpoint and Fugue, Cotel's 'Treatise on Harmony,' and Berlioz's 'Treatise on Modern Instrumentation and Orchestration'—all translated by Mrs. Mary Cowden-Clarke; Fétis's 'Treatise on Choir and Chorus Singing,' translated by the Rev. T. Helmore; Albrechtsberger's 'Collected Writings on Thorough-Bass, Harmony and Composition for self-instruction' (2 vols.), Mozart's 'Succinct Thorough-Bass School,' both translated by Sabilla Novello; and Crotch's 'Elements of Musical Composition.' For the English translation of Berlioz's 'Treatise on Instrumentation' the composer wrote a special chapter on conducting. Other interesting and valuable works published during this period were Stainer and Barrett's 'Dictionary of Musical Terms' (1876) and Carl Engel's 'Musical Myths and Facts' (1876). In 1877 appeared the first volume—Ernst Pauer's 'Treatise on the Pianoforte'—of a new series, 'Novello's Music Primers' under the editorship of Sir John Stainer (later of Sir Hubert Parry). These volumes, of which about seventy have been issued to date, cover between them the whole field of practical, theoretical, and historical instruction in music; the list of writers includes such names as those of Sir Hubert Parry, Dr. W. H. Hadow, A. J. Ellis, the Rev. T. Helmore, Ebenezer Prout, Franklin Taylor, Mathis Lussy, Edward Dannreuther, and A. J. Hipkins.

The early eighties saw the publication of two literary works of the first importance,—undertaken by the firm of Novello with small regard to the question of whether they were likely to turn out a financial success, the main object being to place the English public in possession of the two standard works upon their respective subjects. These were Otto Jahn's 'Life of Mozart,' translated by Pauline D. Townshend (8 vols.), and Philipp Spitta's 'Life of Bach,' translated by Clara Bell and J. A. Fuller Maitland (8 vols.). About the same time appeared Carl Engel's scholarly 'Researches into the Early History of the Violin Family' (1888)—this being a posthumous publication. The same writer's 'Musical Myths and Facts' had been issued in 1876, and his 'Literature of National Music' (a reprint of articles in the Musical Times) in 1879. Other noteworthy publications of the firm in the field of musical literature have been Captain Day's sumptuous volume on 'The Music and Musical Instruments of Southern India and the Deccan,' with its seventeen fine chromo-lithographic plates by William Gibb; Professor Niecks's 'Chopin as a Man and Musician'; Sir George Grove's painstaking and enthusiastic 'Beethoven and his Nine Symphonies'; a large volume of fifty compositions of Dufay and his contemporaries (1400-1440), transcribed from MSS. in the Bodleian Library, edited by Mr. E. W. B. Nicholson and Sir John Stainer; Mr. F. G. Edwards' 'History of Mendelssohn's "Elijah"'; a translation of Hanslick's 'Vom Musikalisch-Schönen,' under the title of 'The Beautiful in Music'; Moritz Hauptmann's 'Letters of a Leipsic Cantor'; Edward Holmes's 'Life of Mozart'; Mr. Daniel Gregory Mason's 'From Grieg to Brahms'; Stainer's 'Early Bodleian Music,' in two volumes, containing sacred and secular compositions dating from about 1185-1505; a translation of Wasielewski's 'The Violoncello and its History'; a handsome volume in commemoration of the Music Loan Exhibition of the Worshipful Company of Musicians; and Professor Niecks's exhaustive book on 'Programme Music.'

PROGRESS OF THE MUSICAL TIMES.

All these years the Musical Times was steadily pursuing its policy of giving its readers not only a complete monthly survey of the course of events in London, the provinces, and abroad, but a constant supply of historical, biographical, and critical articles by the leading writers of the day, both English and foreign. The writer of a retrospective article in the Jubilee number of the journal (June 1, 1894), gave his own youthful experience of the usefulness of the early issues of it, and the eagerness with which it was awaited each month. After speaking of the boon the musical supplements were to singing classes all over the country in the days when good music was as a rule prohibitively dear, he goes on to refer to 'the literary matter, which, while unpretentious, opened up a new world to thousands of budding amateurs. Through this medium we began to make acquaintance with the great masters of music, to learn the opinions of cultivated minds, and to gain some idea of musical activities on the stage of the world—advantages not easily obtainable from the columns of the local newspaper, or through casual perusal of a high-priced London daily. Perhaps the most useful feature in the journal at that time was the brief paragraphs recording the doings of musical societies and classes all the country over. Apart from the information they conveyed, and the means they afforded of estimating the comparative popularity of composers and their works, these paragraphs served to excite emulation and stimulate progress. It may appear a triviality in days of universal and indiscriminate publicity, but it is a fact that the chance of figuring in the Musical Times was sufficient to encourage a good deal of hard work at preparations for public display.'

While thus fulfilling one of the functions for which it was called into being—the encouragement of choral singing in England—the paper gradually added to and improved its purely literary columns. Distinction had been lent to it as early as 1846 by the addition to its staff of Edward Holmes (1797-1859), the author of 'A Ramble among the Musicians of Germany' (1828), and of a 'Life of Mozart' (1845) that is still of value. He was the favourite pupil of Vincent Novello; Mrs. Cowden-Clarke tells us in her biography of her father that 'in order to facilitate the more assiduous study of the young man, Mr. Novello received Edward Holmes as an inmate of his own house; so that at all hours left free by other avocations, he could superintend the progress of his pupil in theory and practice.' Holmes contributed to the Musical Times analyses of Haydn's and Mozart's Masses, a 'Life of Purcell' (1847, afterwards issued with Alfred Novello's second edition of the composer's Sacred Works), 'Curiosities of Musical History' and 'Cathedral Music and Composers' (1850), 'English Glee and Madrigal Composers' (1851), 'Addenda to the Life of Mozart,' and 'Beethoven's Mass in C' (1858).

Other writers were equally busy. A Life of Palestrina commenced in the issue of September, 1847, and in January, 1848, appeared a biography and critical estimate of Mendelssohn, who had died November 4, 1847.

In May, 1852, appeared the first review of the London Musical Season, written by Mr. H. C. Lunn, who undertook a similar annual retrospect for many successive years. From the fifties to the present day the Musical Times has enlisted in its service most of the well-known musical writers of each generation. It is interesting to learn that between 1853 and 1856, when Mrs. Mary Cowden-Clarke was editress of the paper, Leigh Hunt contributed a number of articles,—more Huntian, of course, than strictly musical.

For some time in 1854 and 1855 the journal was issued fortnightly, the monthly order being then reverted to. In 1855 and 1856 Sabilla Novello translated for its columns the 'Soirées de l'orchestre' of Berlioz, and in 1865 published in it some articles 'On Voice and Musical Art' that led to an immediate increase of several thousands in the circulation. In 1859 reviews became a feature of the paper. In January and February, 1862, appeared Mrs. Cowden-Clarke's biography of her father, who had died on August 9, 1861; these articles were subsequently issued in book form.

In 1863, Mr. Henry C. Lunn became editor, and quickly gathered round him a representative body of contributors, including J. C. Lobe, G. A. Macfarren, E. F. Rimbault, W. A. Barrett, John Stainer, W. H. Cummings, Ebenezer Prout, Carl Engel, H. H. Statham, and Joseph Bennett; the first article of the latter appeared in 1873. In the number for April, 1869, Dr. William Pole began his fascinating 'Story of Mozart's Requiem,' which was afterwards brought out in volume form. G. A. Macfarren's articles at this time were particularly instructive; they covered such varied topics as 'Bach's Passion Music,' 'The National Music of our Native Land,' 'Oratorios in Church,' Bach's

'St. John Passion,' 'The Accompaniment of Recitative,' Handel's 'Theodora,' and 'The Pictorial Power of Music.' In 1877 Dr. Chrysander, the famous editor and biographer of Handel, contributed his 'Sketch of the History of Music Printing from the 15th to the 19th Centuries.' In 1877 Mr. Lunn retired from the editorship, being succeeded by Dr. W. A. Barrett. The next decade saw the accession of some new writers, including Professor Niecks, Ludwig Nohl, A. J. Jaeger, and Francis Hueffer. Dr. Barrett died in 1891, and was succeeded by Mr. E. F. Jacques, who was followed in 1897 by Mr. F. G. Edwards. The latter died November 28, 1909, when the present editor, Dr. W. G. McNaught, took the chief command. Among the leading contributors in recent years may be named, Dr. W. G. Alcock, Mr. H. C. Colles, Mr. Frederick Corder, Dr. W. H. Hadow, Mr. A. J. Hipkins, Mr. Arthur Johnstone, Mr. A. Kalisch, Mr. H. E. Krehbiel, Mr. Robin Legge, Herr Otto Lessmann, Dr. Charles Maclean, Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland, Herr E. Mandyczewski, Mr. Ernest Newman, Mr. W. Barclay Squire, Mr. J. S. Shedlock, Mr. J. F. R. Stainer, Mr. Herbert Thompson, and Mr. Gilbert Webb.

The Musical Times has thus completed sixty-seven years of life—a longevity never equalled by any other English journal devoted to music. The old Musical World approached it most nearly, with its useful and honourable career of fifty-five years, from 1836 to 1891. On June 1, 1894, a 'Jubilee Number' was issued, containing a facsimile of the first issue. Ten years later the journal was able to indulge in a 'Diamond Jubilee Retrospect.'

On the occasion of the Jubilee a number of congratulatory letters were received, some of which were printed in the current Musical Times. All of them laid stress on the great boon that cheap music had been in England and among the English-speaking communities, and especially on the vast influence it had had for good upon the services of the churches. The Musical Society of Victoria testified to the esteem in which the Musical Times was held in Australia; and the Rev. G. T. Rider, Art and Literary Editor of the Living Church, Chicago, spoke of the improvement brought about in American worship by Novello's anthems and services. Half-a-century ago, he said, there were none of these of native growth; 'until Novello's brave and happily successful experiment of providing, at stated intervals, and at a nominal cost, the very best of . . . Anglican compositions, the liturgic worship of the American church continued in the most deplorable condition.' But most interesting and gratifying of all was a letter of Mr. Gladstone, acknowledging a copy of the 'Short History of Cheap Music, as exemplified in the Records of the House of Novello, Ewer & Co.,' and special Musical Times supplements devoted respectively to Handel, Mozart and Beethoven. The letter ran thus:

'DEAR SIRS,—I receive your gift with particular pleasure, as proceeding from a firm which is inseparably associated in my mind with the introduction of cheap (instead of 'frightfully dear') music into this country, and thereby with the remarkable extension of musical taste, knowledge, and practice among the people of this country during the last half-century.

'I remain, Dear Sirs,
'Your very faithful and obedient,

'Dollis Hill, N.W., 'W. E. GLADSTONE.
'May 18, 1894.'

While on this topic, brief mention may be made of two other journals issued by the firm of Novello. One of these,—The School Music Review—is still flourishing. It was founded in 1892, and is further alluded to later on in this article. The other journal had a briefer life. Concordia—designated as 'a journal of music and the sister arts'—ran to fifty-two weekly numbers in 1875 and 1876, under the editorship of Mr. Joseph Bennett. It embraced in its surveys not only music but poetry, the drama and the fine arts. It contained a number of interesting articles by W. H. Stone, W. Chappell, C. K. Salaman, H. Sutherland Edwards, Dr. Rimbault, W. H. Cummings, H. H. Statham, Ebenezer Prout, and other writers, but the public support of it was not sufficient to justify its continuance. It is probably impossible to run successfully an English magazine devoted not to one art alone but to many.

NOVELLO'S AS CONCERT-GIVERS.

After this digression into literary matters it is time to return to the more purely musical activities of the firm of Novello. Its leading position in the English musical world gave it opportunities of doing service to the cause of music in more than one field. One of the most fruitful of these was that of concert-giving. As far back as 1867 the firm requested Joseph Barnby, who had been for some years its musical adviser, to organize a choir for the practice of secular and sacred music, 'with the view of presenting at public performances the best specimens of choral compositions, executed in the most finished style.' This new departure was warmly welcomed by press and public. The scope of the concerts was enlarged as time went on. In 1867 two concerts were given; in 1868 four; Mr. Barnby was the conductor, and the programmes included both choral and orchestral works. The concerts were put within the reach of all by the low admission price of one shilling. In 1869 the venture broadened out into the 'Oratorio Concerts,' the object of which was to let the public have opportunities of hearing works of which the rather unadventurous Sacred Harmonic Society—the only other oratorio organization in London—was inclined to fight shy. The first concert was given on February 5, 1869, Handel's 'Jephtha' being performed with Arthur Sullivan's additional accompaniments. An interesting fact in connection with these concerts was that they introduced the Continental pitch (le diapason normal) into England. In the second season nine concerts were given, the works performed including Beethoven's Mass in D (which made a profound impression), his Choral Fantasia and Choral Symphony, Bach's 'St. Matthew Passion,' and Haydn's 'Seasons.' Six concerts were given in the third season, and ten in the fourth (1871-72); the choir by this time numbered 500 voices. Stockhausen sang the part of Elijah for the first time in England at one of the concerts. Bach's 'St. Matthew Passion' had been given in each of the three last seasons; these performances, and a cheap edition of the work published by the firm, roused so much public interest in it as to lead to its being given in Westminster Abbey on Maundy Thursday, August 6, 1871, under Joseph Barnby—the first of a long series of performances of the great work in English cathedrals.

In 1872 the choir of the Oratorio Concerts was amalgamated with that of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society (founded in the previous year), and the firm of Novello was asked to take charge of the new concerts, which were under the direction of Mr. Barnby. In 1874 the bold plan was conceived of giving concerts in the Albert Hall every night of the week—Monday being the ballad night, Tuesday the English night, Wednesday the classical night, Thursday the oratorio night, Friday the Wagner night (a daring stroke this, for 1874!), and Saturday the popular night. The scheme necessitated the formation of two choirs,—a larger one for the oratorios and a smaller one for part-songs; the conductors were Messrs. Barnby, Dannreuther, Randegger, W. H. Thomas, and J. F. Barnett. The plan was carried out for seven weeks, after which the concerts were given twice a week until May, 1875. In that year the firm abandoned the active control of the concerts. Ten years later it established a new series, 'Novello's Oratorio Concerts,' with Dr. A. C. Mackenzie as conductor. Many new or rarely-heard works were given, including Gounod's 'Mors et Vita,' Mackenzie's 'Rose of Sharon,' Liszt's 'St. Elisabeth,' Dvůřák's 'St. Ludmila,' Sullivan's 'Golden Legend,' Spohr's 'Calvary,' and Beethoven's Choral Symphony. These were continued till 1889, when Mr. Alfred H. Littleton was invited to join the committee of the Royal Choral Society, Royal Albert Hall.

of the copyright of the work; and four performances were given, as well as an invitation rehearsal.

In 1881, the English musical world began to be interested in Dvořák, largely as the result of an article on him in the Musical Times—the first in the English press—by Mr. Joseph Bennett. Messrs. Novello published in that year his 'Stabat Mater,' which it was intended to produce at the Birmingham Festival of 1882. This was not found possible, and the work was performed for the first time in England by the London Musical Society (an amateur organization conducted by Mr. Barnby), at St. James's Hall, on March 10, 1883. So great was the success of the work that the composer was invited by Messrs. Novello and the Philharmonic Society to conduct the second performance, on March 13, 1884, this being his first visit to England.

In 1882 Gounod made a tremendous English success with his 'Redemption,' which was first performed at the Birmingham Festival of that year. For this oratorio Messrs. Novello paid the composer the large sum—unparalleled in those days—of £4,000.

In 1886 the firm had the great pleasure of bringing Liszt to England. He had persistently refused large offers to visit our shores as a pianist; but he yielded to the solicitations of Mr. Henry Littleton and other friends to be present at a performance of his 'St. Elizabeth' under Dr. A. C. Mackenzie. It was nearly half a century since Liszt had been to England before. He spent sixteen days in our country; they were a long round of admiration and homage from all classes. He was the guest of Mr. Henry Littleton at the latter's residence, Westwood House, Sydenham.

PUBLICATIONS OF THE FIRM.

The affairs and the publications of the last twenty years or so are more recent history, and considerations of space in themselves make it impossible to pursue the record with anything like the fulness of that of the previous years. The story of the doings of the House of Novello is sufficiently set forth in the catalogues of its publications. There is not an English composer of distinction during the last hundred years who is not represented there; nearly all of them owe the publication of their first work to the firm of Novello. Among the prominent composers of the present and preceding generations whose names will be found in the catalogues of the firm may be mentioned Sir Hubert Parry, Sir Arthur Sullivan, Sir A. C. Mackenzie, Sir Charles Stanford, Sir Edward Elgar, Mr. Granville Bantock, Dr. Walford Davies, Mr. Joseph Holbrooke, Mr. Coleridge-Taylor, Mr. Wolstenholme, Dr. F. H. Cowen, Mr. Edward German, Mr. Rutland Boughton, Mr. Hamish MacCunn, Dr. Ernest Walker, Mr. Ernest Austin, Mr. W. H. Bell, Mr. Percy Pitt, and Miss E. M. Smyth.

The catalogues, twenty in number, cover the whole field of music and of musical literature. Especially ample provision is made for the forms of art that have always flourished the most strongly in this country. Organ music, both new and old, is particularly well represented. The series of 'Original Compositions for the Organ,' which has now run to over four hundred numbers, contains the representative work of some scores of modern writers for the instrument, with an admixture of others by older men such as Bach, Eberlin, Buxtehude, Frescobaldi, Pachelbel and others. The complete edition of the organ works of John Sebastian Bach was the first of its kind to be issued in England. In the series of 'Old English Organ Music' the finest compositions of the men who were the glories of the older English school—Benjamin Cooke, T. A. Walmisley, S. Wesley, W. Crotch, Boyce, Purcell, Nares, Battishill, Attwood, Gibbons, Blow, and many others—are placed within the reach of every organist.

The eight volumes (forty-eight books) of the 'Village Organist' are intended to serve a practical as well as an artistic purpose. Another rich pasturage is opened to organists by the nine volumes (seventy-two parts) of the 'Organist's Quarterly Journal,' and by the very large collection of organ works in John Hiles's series of 'Short Voluntaries' by various composers. In addition there are the organ works of S. S. Wesley, and an enormous number of arrangements for the organ by W. T. Best, Sir George Martin, John E. West, and others. For the harmonium player there is a hardly less plentiful supply. In the catalogue of 'Services' is contained what is probably the fullest collection of the works of English writers for the church that could be put together; many of the services are issued with orchestral accompaniment, fitting them for especially ceremonial use. Even more numerous are the anthems issued by the House; the list covers practically everything of beauty and interest that has been given to the world for more than 800 years. With Bach, Palestrina, Eccard, Purcell, Anerio, Sweelinck, Schubert, Morley, Battishill, Beethoven, Sterndale Bennett, Byrd, Blow, Boyce, Farrant, Gibbons, Tallis, Tye, Humphreys, Brahms, Carissimi, Cherubini, Cornelius, Elgar, Gounod, Greene, Handel, Haydn, Orlando di Lasso, Marcello, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Vittoria, S. S. Wesley, Pergolesi, and a hundred others to draw upon, no English church need labour under the reproach that its anthems are not worthy of its religion. The House of Novello may fairly claim that its cheap editions of all that is best in religious music have done much both to elevate the tone of the ordinary church service and to improve its artistic quality. Upon this point, indeed, almost all the writers of the congratulatory letters published in the Jubilee Number of the Musical Times had something to say. One London clergyman wrote, 'I remember the old time when there was the barrel organ in the west gallery of the church, and the service was commenced with the singing of "I will arise"; the clerk sat in his 'box below the clergyman and led the anthem. 'We did not indulge in many hymn-tunes, as 'the organ only professed to play a limited 'number. Then we had Jackson's Te Deum 'and Jubilate, and with that bill of fare we were 'made content for many years . . . In 'those times the music in use by choirs was in 'MS., and it was no doubt on account of the 'expense of purchasing printed music that so 'little progress in the art was made . . . 'If it had not been for Novello enabling choirs 'to obtain music on such easy terms, music 'would have been behind in the general advance 'of modern education.' It is a far cry from the days of the 'horrid infliction of the charity children's present mode of singing' to the average choir singing of to-day. In the forties of the 19th century there were only four surpliced choirs in London—at St. Paul's, Westminster Abbey, the Chapel Royal, and the Temple Church. 'Such a thing as an anthem,' it was said in the issue of the Musical Times for June 1, 1904, 'much less a solo, in a Nonconformist church would have been regarded with as much horror as rank infidelity. But all that has been changed, and changed very much for the better in the promotion of a more orderly and reverent rendering of divine service in the churches of all denominations.' Other publications of the house of Novello—the many Psalters, manuals of plainsong, chant books, choir manuals, hymnals, carols, &c.—have also undoubtedly helped in this welcome renaissance.

It is, perhaps, almost unnecessary to draw attention to the work done by the firm in the departments of the cantata and the oratorio; it is safe to say that for the past half-century at least there has not been an English musical festival or a series of choral concerts at which the familiar octavo editions have not figured.

Within recent years a number of Bach's church cantatas have been placed within the reach of all, carefully edited and provided with English texts; his larger sacred works have long been available. Most other representative composers in the sacred and secular fields, English and foreign, ancient and modern, will be found in the catalogues of the firm,—Berlioz, Beethoven, Astorga, Byrd, Carissimi, Cherubini, Walford Davies, Dvořák, Brahms, Elgar, Granville Bantock, Gounod, Graun, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Hubert Parry, Palestrina, Purcell, Rossini, Schubert, Schumann, Schütz, Spohr, Stainer, Villiers Stanford, Sullivan, Weber, the Wesleys, Liszt, and many others.

Other publications can be referred to only briefly,—those of works for the pianoforte, violin, violoncello, and other instruments, of part-songs and madrigals for every combination of voices, of folk-songs and national songs, of glees, of solo songs in various languages, of sacred music with Latin words, of works of every description in the tonic sol-fa notation, of music of every possible kind for use in schools, of musical literature, of the operatic series that gave the English public the masterpieces of Auber, Beethoven, Bellini, Donizetti, Gluck, Massenet, Meyerbeer, Mozart, Purcell, Rossini, Schumann, Verdi, Weber, and (in part) Wagner in cheap form and in our own tongue. Nor can more than the briefest reference be made to the large number of full orchestral scores issued by the firm. Here again the firm of Novello has been of service not only to the cause of music and to the music student, but to the innumerable concert societies scattered over England, and last, but not least, to the English composer. It is safe to say that probably in no country has one publishing house issued so many of the full scores of living native composers. The list includes Mr. Ernest Austin's 'Vicar of Bray' variations, Mr. Granville Bantock's 'Old English Suite,' 'Sapphic Poem' and 'Witch of Atlas,' Mr. Frederick Cliffe's Symphony in C minor, Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' Dr. Cowen's 'Ruth' and his fourth and fifth Symphonies, Dr. Walford Davies's 'Everyman,' almost all the works of Elgar, from the 'Black Knight' (Op. 25) to the second Symphony (Op. 63), Mr. Edward German's 'Welsh Rhapsody,' Mr. Henschel's 'Stabat Mater,' Mr. Holbrooke's 'Byron' and 'Apollo and the Seaman,' Mr. Hamish MacCunn's 'Land of the Mountain and the Flood' overture, Sir Alexander Mackenzie's 'Bride,' his Violin concerto, 'Jason,' 'Rose of Sharon' and 'Story of Sayid,' Dr. Horatio Parker's 'Hora Novissima,' Sir Hubert Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' 'Job,' 'Symphonic Variations,' 'English' Symphony and 'Cambridge' Symphony, Mr. Percy Pitt's 'Oriental Rhapsody,' Sir Charles Stanford's 'Irish' Symphony, fourth Symphony and 'Revenge,' and Sullivan's 'Golden Legend.' In addition, there are full scores of numbers of other works by these and other British composers, and still others by Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Gounod ('Redemption,' 'Mors et Vita,' &c.), Tchaikovsky, Wagner and Dvořák (the 'Requiem Mass,' the 'Spectre's Bride,' 'St. Ludmila,' 'Stabat Mater' and the fourth Symphony).

THE SCHOOL MUSIC SERIES AND THE SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW.

In order to meet the demand for a good class of music for use in schools, the firm in 1890 commenced to issue a comprehensive series of school songs, cantatas and operettas that made an appeal to every grade of school from the kindergarten to the teachers' training college. The series was received by the scholastic profession and the press with great approbation. The higher grade schools especially were gratified by the provision of songs by the classical writers such as Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, and others, besides numerous new compositions by the best living British composers, at three-halfpence a copy and in book form.

The great expansion of the interest in music in schools and the demand for discussion of methods of its treatment led the firm in 1893 to establish the School Music Review, a monthly journal issued at three-halfpence, which has now reached its 229th number. The Review is read by teachers in all parts of the English-speaking world, and has created a bond of sympathy between school singing teachers and a forum for the discussion of ways and means. From its establishment to the present day it has been edited by Dr. W. G. McNaught, who also has edited the graded school-song series.

In August, 1908, the Competition Festival Record was established. It is issued each month as a supplement to the Musical Times and the School Music Review. It has proved to be an important factor in the progress of one of the most remarkable musical movements of recent years.

This retrospect will, we trust, justify the pride with which the House of Novello looks back upon its hundred years of life. It has invariably done its best for the public, for the churches, for the home, and for the composer,—for the latter, perhaps, most of all, for in its absence the English composer would have found a far less easy outlet for his work than has been the case during the last half-century at any rate. The firm can thus claim to have been a leading factor in the renaissance that has at last made native English music a phenomenon that can no longer be disregarded on the Continent or elsewhere. The present year finds the activity of the House, and its influence for good, not merely unimpaired but greater than ever. It is certainly the largest firm of its kind in this country, and one of the largest in the world. It has recently been entrusted by His Majesty's Stationery Office with the official printing of the music of the Coronation Form and Order of Service; a similar honour was bestowed upon it in connection with the coronation of the late King Edward. The head of the firm, Mr. Alfred H. Littleton, is this year Master of that venerable institution the Worshipful Company of Musicians. It has had a share in the arduous but pleasant duties of elaborating the arrangements for the International Musical Congress, now sitting in London (May 29—June 3), which, it is hoped, will further consolidate the musicians of Europe and America, and increase the respect of our foreign visitors for England as a musical nation. But the House, even in the year of its centenary, looks to the future rather than to the past. Its hundredth birthday it regards not as green old age but as a mere point in a stage of vigorous maturity.

NO PIANIST

can afford nowadays to be without the help of the well-known MACDONALD SMITH System of Pianoforte Playing.

You have heard of the wonderful results his pupils obtain, but have you tried the Course of Postal Lessons?

The System cannot be explained in an advertisement, but fullest particulars are given in the Illustrated Book "Light on Pianoforte Playing," sent free by post.

COMPLETE COURSE OF LESSONS BY CORRESPONDENCE,

THREE GUINEAS (by instalments if desired).

Course "B" for Beginners, Course "C" for Players.

DO YOU NEED TO PRACTISE YOUR MUSIC BEFORE YOU CAN PLAY IT SATISFACTORILY?

Most players need to practise a new piece over and over before they can give a satisfactory rendering, and probably this is the case with you.

If you were a good sight-player your fingers would fall instinctively and automatically on the right notes, and you would obtain immeasurably greater pleasure from your playing.

Years of daily practice MAY make you a good sight-player, but my System cannot fail to do so.

I guarantee that a pianist of average ability will become able to play any piece within his or her technical ability after three months of about 15 minutes' daily practising. The testimony of hundreds of students will amply corroborate this claim.

Booklet sent free to any pianist.

JULY 1, 1911.

THE CORONATION OF KING GEORGE THE FIFTH AND QUEEN MARY IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY, JUNE 22, 1911.

This great State function was carried through with due dignity, splendour and solemnity in the presence of a vast concourse of notabilities representative of the whole vast British Empire and of practically every foreign nation on the globe. The imposing ceremony was one that kindled the imagination of all who were privileged to be present, and it was calculated to stir the pride of every patriotic Briton. To the musician there was an added gratification in the obvious indispensability of music, and it was a tribute to the genius of British composers that nearly all the service music was drawn from their works and that it proved to be so fit for its high purpose.

We need not here describe the details of the elaborate ritual which occupied nearly three hours. The choir had to assemble at 8.30, but the important formal proceedings did not begin until about 11 o'clock. Meanwhile the orchestra played some of the pieces enumerated below, and Dr. Alcock—now, to the gratification of all his friends, an M.V.O.—played on the organ in his best style. The entry of the Queen and King (we follow the processional order) began the service proper. This was the signal for the singing of Sir Hubert Parry's broad and fine anthem, 'I was glad when they said unto me.' The course of this music is interrupted for about a dozen bars during which, in accordance with a time-honoured privilege, the King's scholars of Westminster School (who were stationed in the Triforium) shouted 'Vivat Regina Maria! Vivat! Rex Georgius!' The words are set to a sort of animated recitative. The musical effect was pleasing, in so far as it provoked a smile, and otherwise it was exhilarating in its naturalness. During the Recognition, the choir did service by lustily shouting 'God save King George!' and then succeeded the Litany, with its incomparable setting by Tallis. The Introit was the profoundly beautiful fourteen bars, 'Let my prayer come up,' by Henry Purcell. The Creed was sung to John Merbecke's solemn setting, to which Sir George Martin had arranged a fine accompaniment for brass instruments and organ.

During the Anointing the 'Veni Creator Spiritus' was sung to the ancient Plain-song attributed to Palestrina, and then came the apparently indispensable Coronation anthem, 'Zadok the Priest,' by Handel. The massive diatonic choruses of this work displayed the choir at its best. After the putting on of the crown, Sir Walter Parratt's vigorous Confortare, 'Be strong, and play the man,' was sung, and at the Homage a new anthem,

'Rejoice in the Lord, O ye righteous,' was given. This is one of Sir Frederick Bridge's most notable contributions to ecclesiastical music. A solo tenor part was sung with much warmth by Mr. Edward Lloyd, who had emerged from his retirement for the occasion. A great effect is made at the conclusion of the anthem by the introduction of the chorale, 'Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott.'

During the Communion the offertory 'O hearken Thou,' composed for the occasion by Sir Edward Elgar, made a deep impression. It is written in the composer's latest vocal idiom, and its beauty, originality, and elevation provided one of the most memorable moments of the whole service. It was sung twice through, the first time by a semi-chorus and the second time by the full chorus. A new Sanctus, by Dr. Alcock, was not less effective and appropriate. The first three utterances of the word 'Holy' are low and hushed, and finely contrasted with the upward sweep of melodic themes in the accompaniment. A short soprano solo accompanied by the chorus leads up to a climax of splendid intensity, the choral parts being distributed in a manner that enables the singers to display the utmost sonority. A final Amen brings back the mood of tranquil adoration. Stainer's seven-fold Amen was used after the Prayer of Consecration, and the Lord's Prayer was sung to Merbecke's music. The Gloria was given in a new setting in B flat by Sir Charles Stanford, who brought to the work his ripest experience and command of modern harmony. The setting is an elaborate one, and it displays much original thought and fine treatment.

An Amen by Orlando Gibbons carried us to another world, and then came the most important new work composed for the service, Sir Hubert Parry's Te Deum Laudamus. This imposing setting displays to great advantage the composer's breadth of style and power to associate intimately words and music. It contains many passages of splendour, and a Lento section has much beauty of melodic treatment. It is impossible in this necessarily cursory account to do justice to so long a work (it occupies thirty-six pages of the service book). Coming as it did at the close of a very long service, when the performers were wearied after their five hours' confinement in a limited space, it was not so effectively presented as were other items given earlier. No doubt there will be other and more favourable opportunities of making a closer acquaintance with the setting. The only other music with which the choir was concerned was the National Anthem. After the departure of the Royalties, the choir, orchestra and congregation dispersed as quickly as the outside arrangements would permit, and the great Coronation Service was over. But the memory of its incidents will for all who were present be lifelong. Sir Frederick Bridge, by his alertness and the exercise of unprecedented experience, has added one more to his numerous laurels, and Dr. Alcock has once again exhibited his great ability as an accompanist and performer on the organ.

WAGNER'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

By HERBERT THOMPSON.

The unhappy circumstances of Wagner's early and improvident marriage are told, and are in many respects even more tragic than one surmised. It is apparent that Minna Planer was not a fitting partner for him, and it was undoubtedly her pretty face rather than her character which attracted him. He, too, with his fiery temper and keen ambition, was anything but a comfortable spouse, and he acknowledges his shortcomings in this respect, as he does his wife's courage and helpfulness in all their terrible Paris time. The long and dangerous voyage from Riga to London (lasting three weeks!) is described with a vividness which proves how strongly it had impressed itself upon Wagner's memory. The week they spent in viewing the sights of London included a visit to the House of Lords, where Wagner witnessed a debate in which Lord Melbourne (then Premier), Lord Brougham, the Duke of Wellington, Lord Lyndhurst and the Bishop of London took part. The Duke, with his grey beaver hat on his head and both hands in his trouser-pockets, accentuating by the movements of his body the points of his speech, which was delivered in a very conversational fashion, seems to have made a disillusionising but very pleasant impression on his hearer. Among the events in Paris may be mentioned a visit to Lablache, whom he sought to propitiate by writing an air which he could as Orovist sing in Bellini's 'Norma.' He was politely received, but, as in all his Parisian enterprises, he got no more lasting results than a 'polite reception.' We are told how he was reduced to perambulating the Paris streets in sole-less boots; and how, when the arrival of a parcel seemed to promise help, it turned out to be the score of the 'Rule, Britannia' overture returned by the London Philharmonic Society, on which seven francs postage was payable. As Wagner possessed no such sum as seven francs in the world, he could not take in the parcel, and his only copy of the score was lost to him. Possibly it was this score whose reappearance was rumoured some few years ago (see the Musical Times, 1904, p. 372). The lowest depth was reached when Wagner was commissioned to write a 'Méthode' for the cornet à pistons, an even greater indignity for an ambitious young composer than the concoction of arrangements from Donizetti's 'Favorita.'

Before leaving Paris he had come across the story of the 'Venusberg,' so when, on his way to Dresden, in the spring of 1842, he found himself in Eisenach, he visited the Wartburg, and found his way thence to the 'Hörselberg,' the reputed Hill of Venus, constructing in his mind as he walked a picture of the scene which he afterwards utilised for the third act of 'Tannhäuser.' There are some other interesting little details connected with this opera. In the summer of 1842, during a stay at Töplitz, he began the sketch, and as he was making his daily ascent of the Wostrai, a neighbouring height, he heard a shepherd piping a merry dance-tune, and incorporated the idea into the chorus of Pilgrims, but, when he came to compose it, could not recall the tune and had to invent one for himself. The 'popular' character of the march is explained by the fact of its being adapted from a little pièce de circonstance composed at a moment's notice to celebrate the return of the King of Saxony from a visit to England. The occasion is mentioned by Ellis, but is described in greater detail by Wagner, as are all the preparations for the production of the opera, including the long delayed scenery which was painted in Paris. About this time (1845) occurs the first mention of 'Die Meistersinger.' He was spending a summer vacation in Marienbad, and was full of ideas for 'Lohengrin,' but was warned not to occupy his mind with any strenuous labour. So he turned his attention to the Nuremberg Mastersingers, of whom he had been reading in Gervinus's 'History of German Literature.' He had been greatly taken with the name of the 'Marker,' and with his functions, and in the course of a country walk there came into his mind a comic scene in which Hans Sachs, the shoemaker-poet, should mark upon his 'last' the errors made by the 'Marker' in singing, by way of revenge for the pedantic criticisms of the latter. This was the kernel of 'Die Meistersinger,' and he lost no time, in spite of medical prohibitions, in setting it down on paper. It was on another holiday, spent in Saxon Switzerland in 1846, that he began the composition of 'Lohengrin,' concerning which we have an interesting reminiscence. 'When I wanted to set to work at the first sketch of the "Lohengrin" music I was to my great distress beset by the Rossinian melodies of "William Tell," the last opera I had conducted, ringing incessantly in my ears: in my despair I hit upon an effectual method of counteracting this tiresome besetment, by singing with the utmost emphasis the first theme of the ninth Symphony—equally fresh in my memory—as I went on my lonely walk. This proved efficacious.' It is interesting to notice this same theme which, as we have seen, the lad Wagner found so significant, again playing a part in his artistic career. In composing 'Lohengrin,' by the way, he began with the last act, regarding 'Lohengrin's narration' as the germ of the whole work; just as he had done with Senta's ballad in the case of 'The Flying Dutchman.'

Though Wagner always refers to the great masters with respect, he inclines to be sarcastic about his contemporaries, and there is a suspicion of bitterness in his references to Mendelssohn, with whom he had, indeed, very little in common, and he seems to have arrived at terms of greater intimacy with Schumann, though of course they were by no means in perfect sympathy. They walked out together occasionally, and 'so far as was possible with a man so singularly chary of words, exchanged ideas on many subjects of musical interest.' Hiller was among his Dresden acquaintances, but references to him are always tinged with contempt. Liszt, Spohr, and Spontini he speaks of with cordiality, but they were almost the only musicians of the first rank who showed real sympathy with his aims, and, like all composers, he found it difficult to appreciate those of his colleagues with whom he was not in sympathy. He certainly gave frank expression to his dislikes, but after all the difference between him and other musicians in this respect is not so very great,—only some have the discretion not to give publicity to their opinions.

It was 'Rienzi' which proved, in a material sense, the turning-point in Wagner's career: it led him to Dresden, and made him famous, but he makes it quite clear that the success it then achieved was due to its least estimable qualities. The delight which the principal tenor, Tichatschek, experienced, was of a purely personal kind. He found his part vocally effective, and it afforded him an opportunity for wearing magnificent attire, so no wonder the rehearsals were accompanied by much enthusiasm. 'Specially favourite passages were greeted by the singers at every rehearsal with acclamation, and an ensemble in the third finale, which later on had unfortunately, on account of the length of the work, to be totally omitted, actually became a source of revenue for me. Tichatschek used to say that this B minor passage was so beautiful, that one ought to pay something for it each time, and put down a bright silver groschen, calling upon the other singers to do the same; in the best of humour all added to the sum; when we got so far, it would be said, "Now comes the Neugroschen place," and Frau Schröder-Devrient, as she too must pull out her purse, declared that this study would make her absolutely poor. I received each time this curious "tantième," and no one suspected that this playful honorarium was often very welcome to me and my wife in providing our dinner.'

Another indication of the character of the success of 'Rienzi' is furnished by an anecdote Wagner tells of his brother Julius, who came over from Leipsic to one of the performances. As the brothers sat in a box in full view of the whole audience, Julius had been warned against making any demonstration of applause. He obeyed the behest till a particular evolution in the ballet roused his enthusiasm so much that he felt compelled to join in the storm of applause, and said that he could restrain himself no longer. Again, it was the ballet which won the interest of the King of Prussia (the first German Emperor), and in later years, when Wagner witnessed a performance at Darmstadt, he found that, while cuts were extensive and numerous, in the ballet repeats and extensions were found necessary! Considering that, he adds, it was just this ballet music over which he had bestowed least trouble, putting it together when at Riga in a few days, it must have been very galling to his artistic pride to find it met with the most enthusiastic approval!

But Wagner's was the 'Nie zufriedene Geist' which always years after something unattained, and it is to his credit that he never wrote down to the popular taste, but always in advance of it. His Dresden career as Royal Capellmeister was, as might be expected from one of his temperament, of increasing difficulty. He began by being the pet of the public, a favourite with the Court, and a friend of the Intendant, but before seven years he had estranged them all. The public were puzzled by the 'Flying Dutchman' and 'Tannhäuser'; the Intendant, Count Lüttichau, no doubt found him a difficult person to deal with, and he and the Court were not unnaturally offended at his democratic ideas, which led him to be identified with the 'May Rising' of 1849. He certainly took no such active part as has been ascribed to him: Mr. Ashton Ellis has proved conclusively that the worst charges against him are baseless, and from his own account, which goes minutely into the events of the three or four fateful days, he appears to have been only a spectator, and in a very slight degree a participator, in the affair. But he was certainly a sympathetic spectator, and his association with some of the ringleaders must have made him a suspected person, so that one cannot wonder if his flight was construed in the worst sense.

Even before this his position had become impossible. In the previous winter the Court had assumed a critical attitude towards his work as a conductor. On one occasion 'The Queen was of opinion that in "Norma" I had "conducted badly"; on another that in "Robert le Diable" I had been "incorrect in my beat"; and for these offences he received official censure. Whatever weight one may attach to royal criticisms, there is no doubt that they count for much with a snobbish public, and in this case it must be admitted that, as the King provided the funds, he had a right to express his opinion as to the result. The singers, noting the royal disfavour, felt themselves in a position to withstand Wagner's wishes in regard to the repertory. His niece, Johanna (whom, by the way, he styles his brother Albert's 'step-daughter,' though dates seem to make his correctness herein doubtful), and the tenor, Tichatschek, joined forces in procuring the production of 'Zampa' and 'La Favorita,' finding the parts suited to their voices and the costumes effective. So Wagner had to conduct the opera which in Paris he had arranged for the cornet-à-pistons, and it, with 'Zampa' and 'Martha' (!), were the principal works he had to conduct during this last season. One can hardly be surprised if a man of his temperament and leanings found the position intolerable.

After the crisis of the Dresden Revolution Wagner became a wanderer, not only during the period of his enforced exile, but up to the time (1864) when his reminiscences come to a close with the King of Bavaria's invitation. He had no official position and no settled income. His operas were but slowly and tentatively taken up, and even the small and fitful returns from this source were, with characteristic improvidence, anticipated. In 1860 we find him offering the 'Nibelungen' trilogy, of which only 'Rheingold,' the prelude, was completed, to Schott; and he adds, with delightful naïveté, 'In the event of Schott accepting my offer, I immediately formed a plan of spending the money thus unexpectedly acquired for the furtherance of my Paris undertaking.'

His childlike love of luxurious surroundings formed another source of embarrassment. Even in his Zurich days, he tells with amusing complacency how Minna arranged for him an ordinary deal work-table, covered with a green cloth and hung round with light green silk curtains, 'which gave uncommon satisfaction to myself and to everyone else who saw it.' His love of silk, satins, and velvet, by the way, may be traced to something more than a mere love of display, for his constant liability to erysipelas no doubt made his skin peculiarly sensitive to soft and delicate textures. After his early privations, one may forgive his inclination to what Liszt chaffingly described as his 'Kleine Éléance,' but one cannot wonder if such a man ran into debts which followed him in his wanderings, and multiplied exceedingly, nor does it seem so outrageous that, at a time when he sought for a peaceful retreat to compose his later works,—none of which could be brought to a hearing until the Bavarian King took Wagner under his protection,—he should have sought the pecuniary help of his friends and admirers.

Nor yet, when one remembers his struggles, can one feel much surprise at a tinge of bitterness which underlies his memories of these times, and is more perceptible here than in his account of his youth, his experiences of which, though still more painful, had grown so remote when he dictated these memoirs that he could speak of them with a certain detachment. Even his intimate friends and ardent supporters, Tausig and Cornelius, come in for an occasional lash. To Saint-Saëns, whom he met in Paris in 1860, he gives the strongest testimonial for his astonishing power for reading at sight the most complicated scores, and for a memory which enabled him to play Wagner's works—including even 'Tristan,'—with such clearness of detail that one would imagine he must have the score always before his eyes. But by way of a set-off to this warm tribute Wagner adds: 'Later I ascertained that this stupendous receptivity in seizing all the technical details of music was not accompanied by any remarkable productivity, so that when he made repeated efforts to appear as a composer I completely lost sight of him.'

The help of his influential friends he accepts as a matter of course, while from his own account of his treatment of Hanslick one cannot wonder if he made that critic an opponent whose attitude was embittered by strong personal feeling. It has often been said that the character of Beckmesser was based on Hanslick's personality, and Wagner, though he gives no countenance to this idea, implies that at any rate the cap fitted, for he gives an account of a reading of the 'Meistersinger' poem in Vienna, when Hanslick, who was present, showed great annoyance, and evidently regarded the whole poem as a pasquinade directed against himself. It certainly cannot be said that Wagner ever went out of his way to conciliate an adversary, and he often did not scruple to estrange a friend: his character was not, perhaps, a very amiable one, but he had at least the virtue of the courage of his opinions.

Among the most interesting episodes in the book are those which refer to the circumstances under which Wagner's works were composed. The introductory scene of 'Rheingold' was conceived under peculiar conditions. After a long and trying journey to Spezia, followed by a sleepless night in an hotel, he took a long walk amid the pine-woods and, tired out, threw himself on a hard bed to seek for sleep which did not come to him, but, he continues, 'I fell into a sort of somnambulist condition, in which I suddenly received the impression of sinking into a strongly flowing stream, the noise of which presently resolved itself into the chord of E flat major, which welled forth continuously, broken up in figures of increasing movement, but never departing from the E flat chord, which by its duration gave a sense of infinity to the element in which I was sinking. With the sensation that the waves were coursing far above my head I woke in affright out of my half-sleep.' This, he realised, was the prelude which had been forming itself, subconsciously, in his mind, and, instead of continuing his travels in search of ideas, he returned to Zurich to begin the composition the clue to which had thus come to him.

In 1861 he was in Venice, and was persuaded to enter the Academy of Arts, where, he tells us, Titian's 'Assumption' made such a profound impression upon him that he felt his creative power renewed within him, and promptly set about composing 'Die Meistersinger.' On the journey to Vienna the musical ideas began to flow, and he at once planned with the greatest clearness the greater part of the overture. This was before he had written the text, to obtain material for which he had recourse to Wagenseil's famous book on Nuremberg and the Mastersingers, a copy of which he procured from the Imperial Library in Vienna. But though he set about this task with great avidity, he met with such obstacles that the opera was not completed at the time when he began his memoirs, for it was not till after his call to Munich that 'Tristan' could be performed, or the 'Mastersingers' and the 'Ring' completed. In the meantime, however, he had found it well to make his aims known by giving performances of portions of his as yet unknown works in concert form. At a concert in Leipsic in 1862 the 'Meistersinger' overture was heard for the first time in public. It was in the Gewandhaus; but the regular attenders of the subscription concerts made it a point of honour not to attend, and Wagner 'never saw a concert-room quite so empty on a similar occasion.' For another concert which Wagner gave in Vienna several concert-selections from the later works were prepared, and he got some of his friends to assist him in preparing the orchestral parts. In this connection we have an interesting incident: 'Tausig also introduced Brahms to me, recommending him as "a thoroughly good fellow," who, famous as he already was, would willingly undertake to share their work: to him a portion of the "Meistersinger" was allotted. He behaved indeed modestly and genially; but he was so quiet that he was often hardly noticed in our meetings.' These concerts met with much greater success, a matter on which Wagner had reason to congratulate himself, though here, by the way, the English translation misses the point of his remark. After mentioning the large audience at the third concert, he goes on to say that on this occasion he received a proof of the good taste of the public of Vienna in music, in that the by no means sensational prelude to 'Pogner's address' was encored; by running two sentences together he is made to find the proof of Viennese good taste in the large audience at his concert,—which would be natural enough to think, but indiscreet to set down in a book!

In Breslau he conducted a concert the distinguishing feature of which was that the audience consisted chiefly of Jews, a fact which suggests that Jews are above personal prejudice, seeing that this happened after the publication of 'Das Judenthum in der Musik!'

Of his visit to London in 1855 to conduct the Philharmonic Concerts, an episode which Mr. Ellis, in his biography, has described with such wealth of detail, Wagner gives an interesting account, coloured of course by his individual and not very impartial views. He attributes most of the difficulties he encountered to Costa, who, from what one knows of him, would not be likely to favour a rival, and to J. W. Davison, whose thorough-paced devotion to Mendelssohn set very narrow bounds to his critical outlook. The account of these concerts has many amusing touches. In the analysis which Wagner wrote for the 'Lohengrin' prelude the words 'Holy Grail' and 'God' were very solemnly struck out as unfitting in the programme of a secular concert. Dr. Wyld, the conductor of the New Philharmonic Concerts, is described as a typical, chubby Englishman, exceedingly good-natured, but ridiculously incompetent, who had had some lessons in conducting from Lindpaintner, and had progressed far enough in the art to follow with fair success the orchestra, which, for its part, took its own course. Wagner's memory for English names is not always accurate: he writes of Dr. 'Wilde' and of a 'Mr. MacFarrine,' whose overture 'Steeple Chase' seems to have found favour with Wagner, who admired its 'peculiar, wildly passionate character,' and enjoyed conducting it. The reference is, of course, to G. A. Macfarren and his 'Chevy-Chase' overture, concerning which an explanatory note might well have been added to the English translation. The London theatres Wagner found interesting; a fairy-tale extravaganza at the Adelphi appealed to his imagination, and some Shakespearean revivals had much to recommend them. The Sacred Harmonic Society's oratorio performances were, as may be imagined, less to Wagner's taste. He gives them credit for great precision, especially in 'Messiah,' and here, with some truth, he recognizes the real spirit underlying English musical taste, 'which' he finds 'is allied to the spirit of English Protestantism, so that such an oratorio performance meets with much more general appreciation than opera; and has, besides, this advantage, that an oratorio concert is so like a church-service that it almost counts as an attendance at church. Just as at church one sits with a prayer-book, one sees there in the hands of the audience the scores, which in a popular shilling edition are sold at the ticket office, and are followed most diligently.' As, however, Wagner goes on to say that his chief recollection of his stay in London is one of uninterruptedly bad health, of suffering from a succession of colds, it may well be that his experience was a jaundiced one, and it would be interesting to know whether his impressions were more favourable when he came, in 1877, as a composer who had won his way to fame and fortune. He ends his account of this episode by mentioning that, as a distraction from the task of instrumenting 'Die Walküre,' he took to reading Dante, 'whose "Inferno" acquired an unforgettable realism in the London atmosphere.'

For Paris, Wagner had a hankering rather strange in view of the painful disillusionment of his first visit. His long stay there in 1859-61, ending with the terrible fiasco of the 'Tannhäuser' production, brought him very little further, and it is worthy of note that all his later works had been accepted in England long before they had been even heard in France. In 1882 all his operas, from 'Rienzi' to the 'Ring,' were given in London, and it was not till some years after his death that the reaction began in Paris from the time when Wagner was so unpopular that 'Lohengrin' was prohibited for fear of a popular tumult. Wagner tells with great spirit of his long struggle for the adequate production of 'Tannhäuser,' how from the first the Director, Alphonse Royer, insisted on the necessity of remodelling the second Act so as to introduce a ballet at the hour when it was expected by the opera-habitues, of the difficulty experienced in translating the libretto, of the painful and exhausting rehearsals, and of the incompetence of the conductor, Dietzsch. Finally, there was the uproar raised by the fine gentlemen of the Jockey Club, whose shrill whistles made the music inaudible, and who persisted with such determination that at the third performance, when the composer stayed at home, the proceedings were twice suspended by free fights of a quarter of an hour's duration! On this occasion the presence of a strong force of police conveyed the impression that order was to be maintained, but it turned out that they were there to ensure the safety of the 'Jockeys,' who feared reprisals on the part of those who wished to listen to the music!

Wagner had, however, some compensation in the many artistic friends he won at this time. Berlioz, as we know from his letters, did not conceal his delight at the failure of one for whom he professed some friendship, but whom he must have regarded as a dangerous rival. Gounod, on the other hand, though Wagner never pretended to admire his music, seems to have behaved with chivalry: 'It was reported to me that everywhere in society he spoke up for me with enthusiasm; he was said to have exclaimed, "Que Dieu me donne une pareille chute." As an acknowledgment I presented him with a score of "Tristan und Isolde," for his behaviour delighted me all the more, since no considerations of friendship had been able to induce me to hear his "Faust." Happily, as the way seemed for the time closed in Paris, it became open in Germany, for a grudging consent was obtained from King John of Saxony to Wagner's return to other German States, though that of his own home was still forbidden to him. He was now able to witness, for the first time, a performance of 'Lohengrin,' an event which took place in Vienna. It was on this occasion, by the way, that Hanslick sought for an introduction, and was, according to Wagner's own account, received so brusquely as to make any reconciliation impossible. It was in this way that Wagner himself contributed not a little to the acerbity with which the controversy surrounding his works was conducted.

Not the least interesting features of these frank memoirs are Wagner's accounts of his relations with the women who took an interest in his career. His first wife, Minna, though in many respects an excellent helpmeet, was notoriously without sympathy for his artistic ambitions, but his friendships for Madame Laussot and Frau Wesendonck, though they caused many heart-burnings, seem to have been based on admiration for his genius. The latter affair is certainly minimised, for the published correspondence shows how deep was the feeling between them, and one can understand how Wagner, dictating to his second wife, Cosima, these recollections, did not incline to make too much of them. But there can be no doubt that, however liable to misapprehension, there was nothing to be ashamed of in the affair, to which those concerned had the wisdom to put an end before there was the possibility that sympathy could develop into passion. As for the Laussot episode, it reads like a chapter in a French novel: a jealous husband calling for the aid of the police, and a suspicious mother making mischief about nothing. Concerning the more delicate matter of his attachment for Cosima von Bülow, Wagner writes with a frankness which makes it difficult to believe he could have intended his autobiography to be published during her lifetime. We are made, by many allusions, to realise that their union was the result of a very gradual growth, for a long time hardly acknowledged even by themselves, but becoming in the end inevitable. Whatever judgment may be passed on this and other episodes in Wagner's career, one can only rejoice that there is no attempt to present only one side of his character, but that the shadows combine with the lights to give us a picture of a real human being, not the impossible hero of a common type of biography.

THE INTERNATIONAL MUSICAL CONGRESS.

LONDON, MAY 29 TO JUNE 3.

The long-prepared and much-discussed Congress organized by the British Section of the International Musical Society was by general consent admitted to be a brilliant consummation. In the first place the Congress Committee succeeded in gaining the confidence and substantial support of many leading men and societies in this country, and were therefore free from financial anxiety, and in the next place they succeeded in attracting many distinguished foreign musicians and in giving them a reception unmistakable in its cordiality. There were some difficulties in connection with the reading at the London University of the eighty-five papers submitted, arising chiefly from the physical limitations of the accommodation provided. But such dissatisfaction as arose was dispelled like the morning mist before the sun when the social functions and the numerous carefully-prepared musical performances began to take place.

The proceedings were initiated by an eminently-successful reception given by Messrs. Novello & Co. in their music room at Wardour Street. The guests came in almost overwhelming numbers (a full list is given below), and were soon in polyglot conversation with one another and their British hosts.

An interesting feature of this event was the exhibition of a series of printed music books belonging to Mr. Alfred H. Littleton, illustrating the progress of music-printing from its beginning in the 15th century to the end of the 17th century. The band of the Royal Regiment of Artillery, under Mr. E. C. Stretton, performed a miscellaneous selection, and a party of six singers sang a number of English glees for male-voices. On Tuesday morning, May 30, the formal opening of the Congress took place at the London University (Imperial Institute), South Kensington. Mr. A. J. Balfour, M.P., the president of the Congress, made a notable speech, which, with other speeches made, is reported on pp. 444-6. On the same afternoon an extremely interesting concert of old English Chamber music, arranged by Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland, was given. The programmes of this and the other concerts will be found on pp. 449-51. A reception and tea was kindly arranged for by the Lyceum Club to follow this concert. An orchestral concert of works by British composers was given at the Queen's Hall on the same evening. As it is impossible to criticise the mass of music presented on this and on other occasions, we have to be content simply to record the performance. The audience at the Queen's Hall was small, but this was not by any means the only concert given during the Coronation period that suffered lack of support. On Wednesday, May 31, the reading of papers took place, and during the morning the band of the Coldstream Guards, under Lieut. Mackenzie Rogan, Mus. Doc., performed; on the same afternoon a deeply interesting selection of English Church music was impressively presented at St. Paul's Cathedral under the direction of Sir George Martin. The Lord Mayor (Sir T. Vesey Strong) and Lady Mayoress gave an afternoon reception at the Mansion House, and thus identified the civic authorities with the Congress operations, and in the evening the Grocers' Company received about 500 guests in their magnificent hall and suite of apartments in the City. The hospitality of the Grocers' Company on this occasion was lavish, and greatly pleased the visitors.

On Thursday afternoon, June 1, the Huddersfield Choral Society, which had travelled from Yorkshire that morning, gave a performance of choral works, nearly all of which were unaccompanied. The chief and most successful item was Bach's splendid motet for double choir, 'Sing ye to the Lord.' This masterful work was sung with great virility and deep expression, and it served to exhibit the sonority, musicianship and resource of this famous choral body. Wesley's 'In Exitu' was also very finely sung. Dr. McNaught conducted, as Dr. Coward, the regular conductor, has been absent abroad since March. On the same evening the second orchestral concert was given, at Queen's Hall. The programme included Sir Edward Elgar's new Symphony, this being the second time of its performance. The impression made on its first presentation a week previous was deepened. It was evident that, although even on slight acquaintance, there was much in the Symphony to attract, there is very much more to be discovered when greater familiarity has been gained. This arduous day was followed by a sumptuous midnight reception, given at the offices of the Daily Telegraph. The processes of preparing the journal were exhibited, and at 2 a.m. each visitor was presented with a copy of the ensuing day's issue, containing a full account of the reception.

On the afternoon of June 2 a long and varied concert of modern English Chamber music was given under the auspices of the Society of British Composers, and this was overlapped by a performance of Early English Church music to Latin words at the Westminster Cathedral, under the direction of Mr. R. R. Terry. On the same evening a banquet was given at the Savoy Hotel, which was attended by 300 guests. The Lord Mayor presided, and delivered an able speech. On Saturday, the Congress members attended at the University to deal with formal business. We have much pleasure in reproducing, as our special supplement this month, the photograph taken at this gathering.

On Saturday, June 3, the British Government extended recognition to the Congress by inviting foreign members to luncheon at the House of Commons. Earl Beauchamp received the visitors on behalf of the Government, and afterwards very kindly conducted them through the Houses of Parliament. Finally, the Opera Syndicate invited members to Covent Garden to hear Verdi's 'Rigoletto,' in which Madame Tetrassini and Signor Sammarco took part.

The full fruits of the London Congress are yet to ripen. But it is certain that the crop will be an abundant one. Never before, in one week, has there been presented such a comprehensive exhibition of British musical art.

OPENING CERÉMONY AT THE UNIVERSITY OF LONDON, IMPERIAL INSTITUTE ROAD, ON MAY 30, AT 12 O'CLOCK NOON.

THE RIGHT HON. ARTHUR J. BALFOUR, M.P., presided, and there was a large attendance.

SIR ALEXANDER MACKENZIE said :

Mr. Balfour, Members of the Society, Ladies and Gentlemen, in virtue of my Presidency I assume the privilege of speaking the first words on the occasion of this very happy event which has called us together, and brought to us so many distinguished and prominent Members of the International Musical Society from all parts of the world. These shall be words of warmest and most cordial welcome to London, not only on behalf of the British Section of the Society, but in the name of the musicians and music-lovers of this country who are proud to act as their hosts. (Hear, hear.)

Before we enter upon the business of the first Musical Congress yet held in England, I would point to the gracious act of His Majesty The King in becoming its Patron. It is a sign of goodwill towards our Congress, and an encouragement of every endeavour in its favour in which we all rejoice.

A further mark of honour is paid to the Congress by Mr. Balfour in so amiably consenting to be its President. We all know how much this means in view of the arduous and unceasing duties which so constantly claim him. Let me also gratefully acknowledge the recognition which Earl Beauchamp, on behalf of His Majesty's Government, bestows on our united work. The Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress, as well as the representative Worshipful Company of the City of London, the Grocers' Company, are showing an active interest, and along with many others, including the Royal Opera Syndicate, are taking a most generous share in contributing to the success of this International gathering. All this briefly to mark the fact that the greeting, coming as it does from all quarters, is as general as it is spontaneous. We are all looking forward in agreeable anticipation to the useful work which lies before us during the remainder of this week. Those who have had the time to study the plan of campaign will realise that serious occupation in scientific research has been tempered and lightened by much which we hope will assist in making the visit of our foreign members and friends a pleasurable and memorable one.

Mr. Balfour, I have now a pleasant duty to perform. It is to present to you certain distinguished delegates who have been chosen by the Council to act under you as Vice-Presidents of this Congress, and also the gentlemen who have the honour to represent their respective Governments at the Congress.

These gentlemen having been presented, MR. BALFOUR then delivered his address, without referring to any notes :

Ladies and Gentlemen, I hope you will permit me to express not merely on my own behalf, but on behalf of all musicians and music-lovers in this country, our hearty welcome to our foreign friends, who have come here to adorn the first Musical Congress ever held in this country. I believe I am right in saying that the last Musical Congress was held at Vienna on the centenary of the death of Haydn, and that the Congress preceding it was held at Leipzig on the occasion of the great Bach Festival. We, alas ! in this country cannot boast names like these ; nor are we in a position to celebrate the anniversary of men who in foreign countries have led the great art in which we are all interested.

There was a time, indeed, when Britain bore its full share in the output of music, when we were not behind our Continental friends in our contributions to the art. I suppose we may say that without undue pride, as having represented the facts right down to the middle of the 17th century, and perhaps even later, to the death of Purcell. Why, after that, for a long period we have to admit ourselves to have been, relatively speaking, barren in original production, I know not ; nor perhaps is it within the power of any historical investigator to say why in this century such and such a country excelled in this and that art, and why the period of splendid production has so often in the history of the world been followed by periods as long of comparative barrenness. The fact, however, I think all will admit, is as I have stated it ; and it is even possible to say—putting aside the overpowering personality of Handel, who can hardly be called an English musician, though so much of his art was produced in England, and may have been influenced by his English environment—it is unquestionably true to say, that the original production in the 18th century and in much of the 19th century of British musical art centred in the main round Church services in the great Cathedrals, where a school, if not of profound originality, at least of great merit, has never ceased to flourish.

I think there are signs—I think there have long been signs, and much more than signs—that this state of things is not only coming to an end, but has come to an end. And I certainly can look back over the period of my own life and see how, year by year, more men of original productive capacity have come to the front in this country, until we can now, I think, look our Continental friends in the face and say that England—Britain (your country and mine, Sir Alexander Mackenzie), has at last come into the process of taking its place among the great creative musical communities.

It is fit, then, that at such a moment music-lovers from all parts of the world should come here and meet each other in conference. The value of such Conferences in all branches of learning and of art has long been recognised, and I see no reason why, in music, it should not be as fruitful of admirable results as it has proved itself in other departments.

Indeed, when I look down the list of subjects which are going to be discussed, I do not think any member of the Congress will complain that the sphere of discussion is unduly limited. The history of the art, the theory of the art, matters æsthetic, matters dealing with music as it was, with music as it is, with the evolution of the art, which of all the arts is at this moment showing itself more eager about the future than about the past, looking forward with a more confident belief to what it is going to be, and not merely casting, as some of the arts are apt to do, longing glances back into the historic past, appraising what has been done—music, I say, which is in this living and vital stage, is surely, of all the arts, the one in which those who take an interest in its future, as well as those who have a learned knowledge of its past, may meet together and exchange ideas.

Indeed, I think from all points of view discussion about music, as well as the practice of music and the creation of music, is well deserving the attention of those interested in æsthetic problems. I believe that it would be well worth while for all those who take a deep interest in that kind of problem for a moment to put aside all other arts and concentrate on music ; and for this reason, that we have got, through centuries of discussion on matters literary and artistic, into—I will not say, a jargon of criticism ; but we employ terms as if they were of universal validity in literature and other arts, having absolutely no meaning that I can see when applied to the art in which we are primarily interested. You may see such phrases as 'romanticism,' 'classicism,' 'materialism,' and 'impressionism,' scattered up and down programmes at concerts of good music ; but they really have no meaning and no relevance to musical art. They are borrowed from literature, and when they are applied outside the scheme of literature to the æsthetics of music, they become, in my opinion, if not absolutely unmeaning, as nearly unmeaning as possible. For music has no element of copying Nature like art. It is not framed upon a study of Nature or man, as literature is ; it stands by itself, self-supporting, self-sufficing, not having to borrow either terminology or ideas from any of the sister arts. There is another most interesting peculiarity of music from the philosophic point of view, which is that of all the arts it seems to be more intimately connected with what I may call dry scientific facts. You can state in terms of mathematical physics certain very important truths with which music is intimately connected ; and at first sight it might seem, therefore, as if science was to give you some assistance in building up a theory of musical aesthetics. I confess my own opinion is that that belief will prove to be illusory. The circumstance to which I have adverted is a most interesting fact. It separates music from all the other arts and puts it on quite a separate basis. And although I do not believe that out of the mathematical theory of the scale or of the chords, or of the theory of harmony, you can ever deduce anything in the nature of a true musical æsthetic, still, this intimate relation with mathematics and physics puts it upon entirely separate ground.

I am afraid I have started off rather upon a hobby of my own which may interest very few of those who are listening to me—(cries of 'No, no')—and I will revert to what is more properly the subject which has brought us here together, which is the interchange of social, scientific, and artistic ideas upon the great art of which so many I am addressing are distinguished representatives.

Leaving the philosophy of aesthetics far on one side, and turning our gaze to what is, after all, the object of all art, the joy of human beings, surely we stand in these modern times at the head of all the other arts, and have advantages which none of them can pretend to. The painter of pictures, endow him with what genius you like, after all embodies his ideas upon a piece of canvas which, from the very nature of the case, can only be in one place at one time; which can at one moment give pleasure to only a very limited number of human beings; which cannot be moved without difficulty and without risk. Music is independent of space. You can have a symphony of Beethoven played in every musical centre of the world at the same time, if you have a sufficiency of musicians capable of rendering it. Time does not touch it. Neither does that other great barrier to the common artistic enjoyment of civilized nations, the difference of language, affect it. The translator of a masterpiece is not merely a copyist; his personality is not merely interposed, like the personality of all copyists, between the spectator and the original producer. He is a copyist in a different medium from that in which the original was produced. To compare painting with language, you are compelling him to copy in tempera what was painted in oils, or to render as a drawing what was originally a coloured picture. No progress will make it possible for a masterpiece of one language to be in the same full sense a masterpiece in another. It must always be confined to the country of its birth, and in the main to those who have learned from infancy the language in which it is rendered. No such limitations attach to our art. All can understand it, whatever be their mother tongue. And now that the thoughts of so many of us are occupied in extending widely among the whole community the highest, the greatest and the best of pleasures, I am perfectly certain that of all the arts and of all the finer forms of imagination, that which chooses music as its means of expression is the one which has the greatest future among the masses of all nations.

This gives not merely an artistic but a social significance to such work as this Congress is engaged upon. And all of you who meet together, drawn from far distant lands, to talk about your common interests, all these great objects, I am sure, you will succeed in greatly promoting; and I doubt not that when this Congress comes to an end we in this country shall have undoubtedly profited much by what we have learned from our foreign friends and teachers, and I hope they will go away from our midst not discontented with the warmth of the welcome which we desire to extend to them.

GEHEIMRAT DR. HERMANN KRETZSCHMAR said:

Ladies and Gentlemen, I have the honour to communicate to you the greetings from our German Government, and to express their best wishes for the success of this Congress. We are very much pleased that this Congress is held in London. Musical art is much indebted to your glorious old country; indebted for the spread of counterpoint; indebted for valuable work in the period of Queen Bess and of Shakespeare; indebted for Purcell, and indebted not least for the hospitality and encouragement in later years offered to George Frederick Handel. It is very well, and I rejoice that the arrangements connected with this Congress will afford the foreign delegates an opportunity of hearing not only the best modern English music, but some of the great compositions of past times. We shall leave London and the Congress rich with new ideas, with new experiences, and full of thankful feeling to the Englishmen who invited us so kindly.

PROFESSOR GUIDO ADLER (Vienna) said:

Ladies and Gentlemen, allow me to express my best thanks for my election as Vice-President of this Congress, and also for the cordial way in which you are receiving me as a delegate of the Austrian Government. Which of us would not be always pleased to visit this hospitable country, where we find the highest culture and likewise the most marked development of character? Unquestionably this kingdom, with its long-established Parliamentary Government, is at the head of all civilized countries. Indeed, in music England now holds a position which is prominent, and that at certain times past she took a leading part is a fact known to everybody acquainted with the history of music. The manner in which music was cultivated in this country far back in the Middle Ages serves as a model for certain style-periods. A line of the most illustrious composers, stretching down from the earliest centuries to this day, has served to assure English music a high rank. I will mention only three names from the palmy days of music in England: Thomas Tallis, William Byrd, and—a name we have heard already twice—Henry Purcell (Applause), composers able to hold their own with the greatest of all times.

There is an immortal old English song, entitled to fame as a canon which even now on a spring day we can execute with as great devotion and hear with as much delight as when it was first produced at the beginning of the 13th century. I allude to that delightful composition: 'Sumer is iumen in.' (Applause.) Its effect is as fresh in the present day as it was then, and so English music stands on a solid foundation. To the works of our English contemporaries we will listen with reverent attention; and I hope that the impression produced by them will be as favourable as that made upon all such persons as entered the English pavilion of fine arts at Rome, regarding which there is only one opinion, namely, that it contains some of the best work at present on exhibition in the City of the Seven Hills. On the Continent, the opportunities which we have of hearing the works of our English contemporaries are unfortunately all too few; but recently in Vienna we had the pleasure of enjoying a fine cantata, 'The Sun-God's return,' by the esteemed President of our Society, Sir Alexander Mackenzie. Also the representatives of the modern science of music are indebted to their English colleagues. Particularly, in the analysis of musical form, Englishmen have been pioneers. The results of their researches regarding the most different periods are highly important; and this is true of all musical pedagogy and didactics as employed in English schools of music, regarding which we owe so much to the management of Sir Alexander Mackenzie and Sir Hubert Parry. With what admirable reverence the arrangements which existed at English Colleges in the Middle Ages are preserved, and how valuable are the encyclopædic works, the 'Oxford History of Music,' and Grove's 'Dictionary of Music.' We all wish the monuments of the English art to be published. It was only up to the first half of the last century that the Musical Antiquarian Society carried on their work. But it is impossible for me here to mention the names of all those Englishmen who, in recent years, have made valuable contributions to our knowledge. We stand shoulder to shoulder with you in the making of researches into the history of the tonal art, and rejoice to be able to walk with you in your own country, as well as at the opportunity for social intercourse. With our whole heart we thank you for all that you do for us; and I beg in conclusion, to assure you that as long as memory lasts we shall never forget the English hospitality which renders participation in this first International Musical Congress so enjoyable to us all. (Applause.)

SIR HUBERT PARRY:

Probably you can guess what is the pleasant privilege which has been accorded to me; and you will agree with me that it is very much thrown into relief by the circumstances in which we stand in relation to our foreign visitors. I cannot help setting them before you as a groundwork for what I have got to say—which will not be much; however, we must, I think, feel that we owe an enormous, a most spacious recognition—our appreciation of the wonderful hardihood of our foreign members of the International Congress, coming here in the spirit of generous enterprise to inquire if it is really true that at last there is some music in this country. (Laughter.) After all, they have got to come across those stormy seas first of all; they have got to come to a country which they know quite well is always in a fog. They also come to a country where it is well known that people take their amusements so sadly that it is only quite recently that they have given up selling their wives at Smithfield; and with all those dreadful things before them they have come to inquire into the state of music in a country which is generally reputed not to have any. I think that throws most powerfully into relief our obligations to Mr. Balfour for concerning himself with us at all. We are obliged to have a very good godfather. We must, after all, supply these generous foreigners who have come over in such an enterprising spirit with some kind of guarantee of our actual existence. Quite so. We must, at all events, supply them a name that they can possibly have heard of. (Laughter.) We know quite well that Mr. Balfour's name is known even to the savages of Tierra del Fuego. (renewed laughter), and of course also to the penguins of the artistic Antarctic Circle. They regard him as a model of everything which should be honourable, wide-minded, patient, a mirror of most wonderful equanimity, cheerfulness, pleasantness and sweetness which makes us all love him. We could not be more lucky in our godfather, could we?

I should like to talk about things that our godfather has been saying, because some of them are most interesting to me. I will not be tempted, except by one thing—because it is so sympathetic to me. You will remember that Mr. Balfour talked about the relation of—*you may say proximity of—*scientific analysis to music. I do not think I am putting it precisely correctly, but you will understand exactly what I mean: the fact that all scientific facts seem to be in close neighbourhood when applied to music. I only have to point out, in expressing my entire sympathy with him on that subject, that the greatest scientist who ever dealt with music finished up his work with a paragraph in which he says: 'Though the mathematical mind and the musical mind seem to have some extraordinary points in common, there is nothing in the world in which they are really wider apart,' and that so far from science being able to show the way to musicians, the business of science is to follow humbly in the wake of those who have got the genius to express themselves in their great art. What Mr. Balfour says, of course, is perfectly true: that the scientist may now come in and analyse, if he please, what we have been doing in this country as well as in that of others. A very good thing; and we shall probably learn a great deal of wisdom from it, I hope, both from foreigners and ourselves; and I hope everybody here will attend all the lectures, especially when they are given three or four at a time in the same room. I must now commend to you what I am sure will be a thing which is most dear: the recognition of the great debt we owe Mr. Balfour for coming here and becoming responsible for us, and the feeling that, after all, his name being so well known as the supporter of everything sound, wholesome and honourable and distinguished—that our foreign friends if they are possibly bewildered by the sounds which are offered to them in the guise of music, will, by having such a godfather as Mr. Balfour, be assured that in spite of appearances we are not open to the charge of being insincere.

Let us, therefore, offer our very warmest thanks to Mr. Balfour for generously coming here amid the tremendous tasks and responsibilities which he has to face, and looking exactly as if he had got nothing else to do, talking so delightfully about the things most interesting to us. (Loud and continued applause.)

MR. BALFOUR, responding, said:

Ladies and Gentlemen, I cannot permit this meeting to separate, after the kind way in which it has shown its appreciation of Sir Hubert Parry's speech, without one word of thanks from myself, but it shall only be a word. Sir Hubert and I were boys together at Eton. We have been firm friends ever since. Eton is now a long way, alas! back in the past; but I have watched with affectionate admiration his musical career, from the time he was the wonder of his boyish contemporaries at Eton as a musical genius to the time when he is, by universal recognition, among the foremost of living composers. (Applause.) I thank you most heartily for your kindness; and before declaring this meeting terminated, let me say, as I have been requested to do, that to those who are interested in the history of the musical past, there is, I believe, a very remarkable collection of musical instruments to be seen at the South Kensington Museum, next door. Many of you probably are unaware of the fact. Some of you, perhaps, may be interested in hearing it. At all events, you will receive a warm welcome if you care to go in and see the efforts of our predecessors in the art in fashioning those instruments by which alone the art can be made expressive.

Ladies and Gentlemen, I heartily thank you.

DR. W. H. CUMMINGS said:

We are here to-day in a magnificent building—I do not refer to this portion of it, but other parts are very fine indeed—and we are indebted to the Vice-Chancellor of this University for putting at the disposal of the Conference all the various rooms that we need, and they are many. I have, therefore, very great pleasure in proposing a hearty vote of thanks to him for the accommodation he has afforded us.

The resolution having been carried:

DR. M. J. M. HILL (Vice-Chancellor) in reply said:

It is a great honour and a great pleasure to have received this distinguished assembly in this building. I am sorry that we cannot afford you anything better than a temporary hall that was erected to receive Her late Majesty Queen Victoria, in 1887. I hope that in course of time, when we receive another Congress in which Mr. Balfour is interested, namely, the Philosophical Congress in 1915, that there will be a better building to place at the disposal of the Congress.

The opening ceremony then terminated.

BANQUET AT THE SAVOY HOTEL, JUNE 2.

The Lord Mayor, the Right Hon. Sir Thomas Vezey Strong, presided, and there were about 300 Ladies and Gentlemen present.

The usual loyal toasts to The King and the members of the Royal Family having been drunk, the LORD MAYOR said:

I have now the honour of proposing another toast—the toast of Kings, Emperors, Presidents and Governments represented by all the delegates and visitors here assembled. It is a tribute of our respect, and with our sincerest wishes that they may ever vie with each other only in the gentle arts of peace. (Applause.)

The toast having been drunk with much enthusiasm, the Lord Mayor continued:

This musical audience will, I am sure, appreciate the difficulty in which I placed the bandmaster in the proposal of the last toast. (Laughter.) He had not ready a medley sufficiently comprehensive to embrace all, and even he hesitates to improvise on such an occasion.

I have heard it said that we in England take our pleasures sadly, but I cannot help feeling that this company, at any rate, does not follow that respectable lead, for a more jubilant assembly it has never been my privilege to be in before. I have now to propose the next toast, which, as we say in this town, is the toast of the evening. It is: Continued success to the International Musical Society. (Cheers.) This is an Association, which, as I understand it, embraces musical people from all parts of the civilised world. It excludes none, and welcomes all who are devoted to the art of music, and the British section of that International Society is doing itself the great honour of entertaining this large and distinguished company as their guests in honour of the International Musical Congress, which has attracted to these shores and to this hall so large an assembly. This International Musical Congress enjoys the patronage of His Majesty The King (Cheers); it has secured the services of that charming personality, Mr. A. J. Balfour (Cheers), as its President—a man who graces everything he touches, and adorns every movement with which he is associated. It has the advantage of Sir Alexander Mackenzie as President; it enjoys the further distinction of having Mr. Alfred Littleton as Deputy Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Congress; and comprises within the limits of its committee practically every well-known musical man in this country. If anything were wanting to add to its completeness, that was supplied when they secured Drs. Maclean and McNaught to act as honorary secretaries. There are many others associated with this movement that I should like to name, but may it be allowed to suffice if I say that the various assistants and the important man, the treasurer, Mr. C. E. Rube, are all worthy associates of those gentlemen I have already named.

We are now assembled on a most remarkable occasion of this most interesting Congress, and if anything still remains to complete our satisfaction it seems to me it is supplied by the fact that the Government of this country for the first time in its history has been good enough to become officially associated with this magnificent Congress, and to give this movement the enormously important sanction, from the point of view of this country at any rate, of official endorsement. (Cheers.) Under these circumstances, ladies and gentlemen, I can with the greatest ease and sincerity most heartily congratulate all concerned in being associated with an unique occasion, and in proposing this toast I want to be allowed to assure all the delegates and visitors who are here assembled, and especially those who come from foreign countries, how much we appreciate the honour they conferred upon music, and on England in particular as host, and how we have enjoyed the advantages of their Company and the contributions they have made to the various discussions of the week. Having said so much—which I cannot inappropriately do, as I have the honour of holding a representative office—I can with all the influence which my ancient office affords add weight to the welcome of the people of London, and through London add the rest of our Empire, to all our foreign visitors here to-day. (Cheers.) But, ladies and gentlemen, I now come to the end of my qualifications, for beyond assuring you in my official capacity of the welcome we all desire to extend to you, and also adding my own appreciation of the great honour of being permitted to preside on this occasion, beyond that I am at a loss to discover why I should occupy this Chair. In my doubt and difficulty I appeal to my wife; and it is becoming increasingly popular in this country 'when in doubt to try the ladies.' But here on this occasion my wife is mute, and all she can say is, 'I cannot for the life of me think why you are invited.' (Laughter.) It seems to me it would be so much more appropriate if some of the musical luminaries who surround me on every hand would speak on behalf of the great art they have so long and so ably served. I, alas, am not musical—at least not specially so, at any rate. I feel somewhat that I am in the position of a man of whom I heard the other night, who, when asked if he was musical said, 'No, but I have a box what is' (laughter), and if it is a qualification to address such an audience as this to be the possessor of a musical box, I can supply it. I do not know if I could not even rise to a mechanical pianoforte (renewed laughter), with which, by the aid of a handle, I could turn out a great many tunes. But, ladies and gentlemen, there have been many distinguished sons, and even daughters, of England who have not been musical. You can scarcely conceive that being possible I dare say, but it was said of Dr. Johnson that, after listening to a charmingly executed pianoforte solo by an equally charming lady, the lady ventured to inquire of the doctor whether he loved music. The gruff but sagacious old doctor said, 'No, madam, but of all the noises I think music is the least disagreeable.' (Laughter.) If I can, by the aid of these two virtues I have quoted, suggest a qualification, however slender, to add one or two more remarks to what I have already said, then I shall know that you are a long-suffering and indulgent people. I think, ladies and gentlemen, it must be apparent to all that music is a fitting subject for international discussion. It seems to me that music like all arts has no recognition of boundary of parish, country, empire, or hemisphere. It is common to all people. It is said that discord was introduced into this world at the time of the Tower of Babel, and from all we have learned of that interesting historical event, we can accept that suggestion. (Laughter.) But, ladies and gentlemen, if discord was introduced it is the high ambition of music to reduce that discord to harmony (Hear, hear), and so approach all nations with an international language to secure international amity. How are we to accomplish the world-wide friendship of the nations. May I suggest a way, which is to cultivate the feeling that no particular nationality has a monopoly of all the virtues or all the talents in all the arts. I own at once as a representative Englishman that it is perhaps a weakness which is common to us English of thinking that after all we are a very good sort of people, and that those outside our magic circle are not on the whole quite so well-informed or so artistic. If we have come to that conclusion in our haste and in our ignorance we regret it, and we hail you now as brethren and say that we are entitled to that monopoly no longer. (Laughter.) And now may I with great respect ask you if that patriotic exaggeration, as I will call it, on our part is entirely the peculiarity of the English race, or if it is not shared to some degree, however small, by the representatives of the Continental nations here assembled? For instance, every Englishman will gladly admit the eminence, if not the pre-eminence, of foreign countries in music. But again with trembling humbleness I want to inquire of my foreign friends if they are always ready to admit as much on behalf of Englishmen: are they just as enthusiastic in their declaration that English music holds a high position in the music of the world? I won't go beyond asking the question (Laughter), but I venture to think, with the openness that characterizes us, that we should have to admit that most of us, if not all of us, have erred hitherto on behalf of what I will again describe as patriotic exaggeration. I heard the other day of a guide in one of the galleries of Florence. He was in charge of some magnificent paintings, and was showing some visitors from a country which was not Italy—and I hope they were not Englishmen—the contents of the gallery, and after five minutes' hurried look round at the paintings which were painted for eternity they said, 'Old Masters; we prefer the new ones.' The poor attendant of the gallery found all his patriotic instincts uprising against the sneering of the visitors, and speaking to one of them he said: 'Our pictures are not on trial; it is the visitors that are.' I think if one cared to point a moral to adorn that tale I should suggest to my friends in England that when they are discussing foreign music, it is not the music that is on its trial but the Englishmen who dare to criticise it. And again with profound submission I would urge even upon my foreign friends that when they come to England and hear the best work of our English composers and musicians that our music is not on trial, it is the foreign visitor. (Cheers.) I think I have exceeded my time and exhausted your patience, and my wife is pulling at the tail of my coat, which indicates to me that in her judgment I have said enough. (No, no.) If I dared to suggest one more thought it would be the thought that music knows no class. It is the friend of the poorest man, it is indeed the chief solace of the poorest. (Cheers.) It is the privilege of the rich, it is the necessity of the poor (Cheers), and it is a blessing to all who drink of its sweetness. Happily in this country we are constantly and every day endeavouring to spread the influence of music, until at the present time no elementary school in the country is allowed to draw a grant from the Government that does not at least devote a certain amount of time to the teaching of the ennobling art of music. (Cheers.) We want to enlist not only the sympathies but the help of all who can spread the magic of music. We in England have been devoting our time to the special study of the promotion of friendship with all countries, and I conceive no agency, I can imagine no missionaries more likely to secure success in the development of that desirable end than you—the missionaries of music. Let our aim and our ambition be international harmony, and let us do all that we can towards that end, and not cease until we have accomplished by our own individual efforts that great object, and then we may pray that come it may, as come it will, when 'Man to man the world o'er shall brothers be for a' that.' (Loud cheers.)

Sir ALEXANDER MACKENZIE said:

My Lord Mayor, my Lady Mayoress, my Lords, Ladies and Gentlemen, you will of course understand that it is the accident of office which bestows upon me the honour of replying in the name of this widespread Society to a toast which has been proposed by the Lord Mayor in such excellent and humorous, and, let me add, impressive terms. Coming as they do from the chief representative of the City of London, they are to us especially grateful and encouraging, and I beg to assure him of our hearty appreciation of his amiable and generous words. We are all devoted to the service of the art of music, and each one of us in our respective lands is working in the interest of music, and it is that cosmopolitan spirit and international intent which has been the means of once more drawing us so happily together. It is just that great underlying idea which has always appealed so very strongly to me, and which proves and declares that this Society is fulfilling its mission and achieving the great object of its existence. (Cheers.) We thank you, Sir, for your amiable and generous words, and I hope you may prove a real prophet in your wishes concerning our future. In my turn I also have a toast to propose, and I do not mind freely confessing that it has been weighing on my soul all day long, and I venture upon it with some diffidence because I rather fear that the subject of my toast, which is 'The health of foreign visitors,' might possibly, after the strenuous endeavours of this most exhilarating week, bear a somewhat more than usual significance, and might in fact induce even sympathetic inquiry. I felt uneasy until I had obtained some accurate knowledge of the real state of the feeling of our guests towards us at this juncture, which is practically the end of the Congress. (Laughter.) But I am enormously relieved to find that, judging by the amiable expression on their faces and by the noises they have made, and by such hurried scraps of conversation as I have artfully contrived to hold, that I have very largely under-estimated their powers of endurance, and I certainly have not done anything like justice to their Spartan-like patience, which seems to be almost unlimited. You all know that mutual instruction is the avowed object, indeed one of the specific objects of our Society, and an insatiable and unslakeable thirst for knowledge is the chief characteristic of its members. I fancy that in one important direction at least we certainly have done our very best to provide a good deal which must have been unfamiliar to the majority of our friends. You will perceive that I am gently and delicately approaching the subject of native music. (Cheers.) It is very gratifying to me that all this British music with which they have been regaled has had no more serious effect upon them than of producing in a few of the least robust a mild attack of home-sickness. (Laughter.) But whatever the effect or the result may have been I assure you our intentions have been strictly honourable. In fact, we have kept back a good deal which we might have let you hear. It would certainly have been easy for us to let you hear a great deal more of a similar kind if time had permitted. Our restraint was certainly not due to lack of material. But speaking more earnestly, a great many of the most worthy names which might have been included in our schemes have had to stand aside simply because there was no room for a great number of instrumentalists and singers in this country of whom we are justly proud. I take the safe opinion on musical history of my friend Sir Hubert Parry, who predicts that this country is going to be as it was in the Elizabethan days a nest of 'song birds'—that I believe is his favourite expression. I follow at a very humble and respectful distance, and would inquire if it has not already become so? 'The sweet fowles that maken melody,' as Chaucer says, are already very numerous, and of every variety in song and feather. There are those purely English nightingales and thrushes which warble so tenderly and tastefully. There are also those Celtic cocks that 'caw' (Laughter), and there are a great many other birds more difficult to classify. (Renewed laughter.) You will admit then that we have a very large nestful in full concert, and Sir Hubert and I know a great many young 'cheepers' who are trying to make their voices heard. After all, the casualties have been very few, and our friends seem, judging from appearances, to have survived it all. (Laughter.) Unbroken good humour still prevails, and I think I can present this toast to you in the customary more expansive and figurative sense. I have a very vivid memory of our meeting two years ago. In fact, it is never out of my mind, and I well recollect my part in the Conference with reference to the projected English Congress. The promise I made was this: That without attempting to vie with the brilliant artistic entertainments which we had, in point of cordiality at least the reception by my colleagues here would not be one whit behind that which we received in the amiable city of Vienna. (Cheers.) The eminent and distinguished guests who have honoured us by their presence have been truly and sincerely welcome (Cheers), and I would like to thank those upon whom the responsibilities for these days have chiefly rested—and they were not small—for having risen to the occasion, and for the quick and ready response to our call, and to express our thanks for the generous support we have received from the upholders of music in this country. It is entirely by their aid that we have been able to carry out the general scheme of the Congress. This, it may be said, is a matter which chiefly concerns ourselves, and has no business here, but I think differently, because it very directly proves that this country has abated not one jot the warmth which it has extended throughout the centuries to music in this land. As for ourselves, our genial intercourse, and the personal intimacy we have enjoyed during these days will be a pleasing and lasting memory. Old friendships have been cemented and many new ones have been found and formed, and surely mutual understanding, reciprocity, and what is still better, good-will, will be the inevitable and natural result of this happy Congress. I beg to couple with the toast the names of three distinguished representatives of foreign countries who will reply. They are: Dr. Hermann Kretzschmar, of Berlin; Professor Guido Adler, of Vienna; and Dr. Jules Ecorcheville, of Paris. And now, ladies and gentlemen, I will ask you to drink the health of our foreign guests upstanding, and with all the enthusiasm at your command. (Cheers.)

DR. HERMANN KRETZSCHMAR said:

Our Congress is coming to its end, and the foreign members of this Society must prepare themselves for the good-bye. That is rather a difficult matter, for to see England and to love England is one and the same. (Cheers.) Nobody can leave this marvellous country without a strong desire to return to it and stay here for ever. I do not intend to narrate the virtues and the charms of England, but among its characteristics there are three points which impress themselves so deeply that I cannot avoid making mention of their excellence. The first is the greatness and the majesty of the British Empire, a majesty speaking to us by public monuments as well as by the whole-souled English life. The second point is the character of this Empire and the character of London, with its splendid contrasts, with its enormous traffic in the streets, and close by its parks with their wonderful trees. The third point is the human spirit of the London inhabitants, the spirit beginning with the kindness of the poor to animals, and culminating in the well-known hospitality, the hospitality which makes a stranger feel at home as soon as he arrives, and regards him as quite an old friend. I beg to thank our Chairman of this evening, and to thank Mr. Balfour and our dearly-beloved President, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, and all the other members of the Committee of this Congress. (Cheers.)

PROFESSOR GUIDO ADLER said:

An old proverb tells us, 'nemo propheta in patria.' And yet I was able here at the commencement of the Congress to speak some prophetic words about the happy course which lay before our Festival: I said them in the University where I have during this week found a second home, because I indeed feel myself anything but a stranger. Your artistic offerings, your social gatherings, have been so successful, so charming, that we your guests will return with the very best recollections to those homes where we again will cease to be prophets. If there may have been added to the harmony of our scientific discussions a few dissonances, it was—according to Sir Hubert Parry—only a necessity, because ugliness is but the corollary of beauty. We human beings cannot very well exist without a little dissonance. In any case these dissonances introduced themselves strictly according to the modern tendency in Art—they certainly were not prepared. But here, my dear English friends, they have all been resolved into sweet consonances. Let me heartily thank you for your amiability and hospitality. Believe me, these days in London will be remembered among the happiest of my life. Beautiful without the least aftertaste, or afterthought of anything unpleasant. May we meet again soon. And I lift my glass in a spirit of thankfulness to drink the health of the Executive Committee and the British Section, the President, and all its members, who have shown us much kindness and good-fellowship.

DR. JULES ECORCHEVILLE, who spoke in French, said :

I need hardly say that I would never have consented to speak on this occasion, after the toasts proposed by such eloquent orators, had I not been called upon to convey to you the official message of good-will from the French government and the sympathies of those of our colleagues who have unfortunately been prevented from crossing the Straits and taking part in our work.

There is no country in which the progress of English music and of all the sciences that appertain to that art are followed with greater attention and interest than in France. Our musical researches often bring to mind the distant period when the English minstrels used to cause a sensation at the court of our Dukes of Burgundy. We have preserved the memory of your admirable lutenists and viol-players, who frequently brought us the elements of a new art. Quite recently there was founded in Paris the British Music Society, whose purpose is to reveal to us the work of your modern masters ; and, a few days ago, I attended a meeting organized by the Société des Amis de la musique, a meeting of English 'virginalists,' which the English ambassador, Sir Francis Bertie, was good enough to honour with his presence.

Again, when we return to France, overwhelmed with kind attentions and lost in admiration of the sumptuous welcome that you have given us, we shall be inundated with questions, giving still further proof of the lively curiosity which our fellow-countrymen feel with respect to your art.

What other reply shall we make, gentlemen, except that this all-too-short week has enabled us to recognize in English music the qualities which make the glory of England ? In the first place there is that mixture of race that gives to the Islanders the poise of their character. Have we not seen represented in one and the same programme the Scotchman Sir Alexander Mackenzie, the Irishman Sir Charles Villiers Stanford, the Welshman Sir Hubert Parry, and the man from the north, the Anglo-Saxon Sir Edward Elgar.

Moreover,—and this is a truly English characteristic—your music is wholesome. It avoids that perpetual sense of irritation with which Continental music is afflicted, that aggressiveness which at least in France gives the impression that our music is always, so to speak, levelled vindictively at someone ! Your art is that of a people of sporting habits, which pays more attention to its muscles than to its nerves.

Finally, English music is essentially hospitable, and this is the feature that it carries best of all. Even in the 18th century you provided a splendid example of musical assimilation in giving to Handel the world-wide glory that he would never have won but for you. Now, we can say here, at a gathering of musical historians, that Handel's music is the music of all Europe, the music of every country, brought together by a powerful hand and welded by genius. The source of Handel is international ; but the perspective in which he is placed is English. It is in this matter of perspective that you excel. It is paramount in your arts as well as in your political life, and in your charming homes. May I permit myself to use an expression which my Lord Mayor will certainly understand, and say that English music is Free Trade music ?

This zeal for the mingling and concentration of the most widely different elements is so much a part of your temperament that our labours at the Congress have given a quite unforeseen instance of it. Thanks to an ingenious disposition of space, we have been able to hold several meetings and to give several lectures simultaneously in the great hall of the University ; to our good Secretary, Dr. Maclean, belongs the credit of having produced for the first time a model of what one might describe as 'musicological polyphony' !

Permit me then, gentlemen, to unite in one and the same toast the music and the musical research of England, and to raise my glass in honour of that musical instinct which is peculiar to your country and which has earned our admiration in all its aspects. The few days of our visit will be preserved for ever in our minds as an ineffaceable memory.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said :

So good and so wonderful is the record of the City of London, in endeavouring in whatever manner possible to give a lead, and a strong lead, in matters of national or international importance, that the general public might very well be beguiled into taking everything that comes from the City of London and its Lord Mayor as a matter of course. We heartily desire to thank the Lord Mayor for his fine and eloquent speech. I ask you to rise and drink the health of the Lord Mayor, who gives such dignity and lustre to his exalted office.

THE LORD MAYOR replied :

My Lord, Ladies and Gentlemen, will you allow me to assure you of my own thanks and the thanks of my wife that you have so kindly accepted the toast proposed by the Earl of Shaftesbury, for whose kind words I am deeply indebted. It has been a great pleasure to my wife and myself to have had the honour of receiving, at our official residence, so many of the ladies and gentlemen attending this Congress. I thought that there my honour ended, but thanks to the liberality of all present, and to the generosity of the Executive Committee, I am happy to be here on this occasion to at least postpone the pain of parting. I hope this Congress will result in real advancement, for music is an international code, and if that be brought about or in any sense helped, then I venture to think that the time you have devoted to this Congress will have been time well spent, and that you will have engaged in mission work the best services of the devoted sons and daughters of Europe.

IMPRESSIONS OF THE INTERNATIONAL MUSICAL CONGRESS.

MONS. M.-D. CALVOCORESSI (Paris) writes:

Congresses are a modern institution, and musical congresses I believe to be the most modern of all. It is perhaps owing to the fact of this particular sort of congresses not being out of its 'teens (or perhaps to the deeper cause that there exists no such thing as an uniform understanding in handling matters connected with musical art) that the practical results of our past musical congresses have been of the scantiest, as far as their immediate and avowed object—the carrying out of painstakingly-passed resolutions—is concerned.

But another and no less desirable result of such meetings between workers from different centres, countries, or even continents, is that they create musical acquaintanceships often ending in cordial and fruitful intercourse, and also enlightenment on ideas or matters often weighty. And in this respect it may forthwith be said that the London Congress has been uncommonly successful. It began, proceeded, and ended in an atmosphere of cheerful cordiality, of which the foreign guests carried away a grateful and enduring remembrance; an atmosphere favourable to the interchange of views, thoughts, and information.

Although the unavoidable division into sections rendered it impossible for any one member to follow all the proceedings, and although it is difficult—even after setting aside all papers read in pursuance of mere hobbies or of private interests—to select from the three-and-eighty that were submitted all that proved not only attractive but instructive and have really taught something worth knowing, one may remark that lectures like that of Mr. Friedlaender on 'German Folk-songs with reference to English and American Folk-songs,' Dr. Hammerich on 'Musical relations between England and Denmark in the 17th century,' Dr. Hadow on 'English Church music,' Madame Lineff on 'Russian Folk-songs,' Dr. Cummings on 'Matthew Locke,' Dr. Stein on 'A presumably early Symphony of Beethoven,' attracted much notice and comment, as well as the contributions of Messrs. Felber, Norlind, F. Keel, Wellesz, H. Antcliffe, Scheuierleer, and others, which all assisted to enlighten on points of no common import.

But to the stranger in quest of fresh knowledge, one of the main features of the week's programme was undoubtedly the series of instrumental and vocal concerts devised for the special benefit of members, and affording the possibility of a survey of British music from its very beginnings to the present day.

Modern British music, as Sir Hubert Parry humorously remarked in his address to the first meeting, is very little known abroad, if not altogether ignored. As to the causes of such a state of things, I ask permission to open here a short parenthesis, and to say that although the contrary belief often prevails, so is all modern music. Having incidentally written once that music is the least international of arts, I was interested to find that random remark singled out and pointed at as a paradox for paradox' sake. But the few exceptions, in cases like those of Strauss, Debussy, Puccini (non passibus æquis), and a few others' do not alter the fact: music takes more time than any other art to cross frontiers. If the international spreading and influence of to-day's literature or fine arts be compared with the spreading and influence of to-day's music, I confidently predict that the results of the comparison will startle the upholders of the theory that music, being the most universal of languages, is the most accessible and satisfactory to all without distinction.

But I must refrain from adducing even the briefest of cases in point, and revert to the Congress. The fact that modern British music was almost unknown to the great majority of the guests has been remedied as fully as possible by the concerts that took place from May 30 to June 3. The occasion was welcome of hearing. Besides beautiful melodies from the output of masters of the past—Gibbons, Munday, Bull, Purcell, and others—works like Sir Edward Elgar's second Symphony, Sir Hubert Parry's 'Symphonic Variations,' Sir Alexander Mackenzie's humoresque, 'Tam o' Shanter,' Sir Charles Stanford's Prelude to the 'Stabat Mater,' Dr. F. H. Cowen's 'Phantasy of life and love,'

Dr. Vaughan Williams's 'Norfolk rhapsody,' excerpts of Mr. F. Corder's opera 'Ossian,' Mr. William Wallace's 'Villon,' Mr. Bell's 'Shepherd,' Mr. Holbrooke's 'Byron,' chamber music and other works by Messrs. B. J. Dale, York Bowen, P. Corder, Trevor Bax, &c., not to copy the whole of the programmes, which afforded a fair bird's-eye view of the British School, and convincing proof of its manifold activities. In fact, the only regret carried away by the listeners was not to be able to enjoy a second hearing of several of the works performed.

The performances attracted in most cases no less notice, and deservedly too. It would be impossible to listen anywhere to a finer body of instrumentalists than the London Symphony Orchestra. The Huddersfield Choral Society, who interpreted most artistically a programme in itself highly artistic, received a due tribute of praise. And it is bare justice to end the present impressions of the Congress, by saying that the conductors and other artists, whom considerations of space alone prevent me from naming, did all that was necessary for the audiences thoroughly to enjoy the novel experience of the contact with British music of to-day. Thus proved successful to their minutest details, the results of the exertions of the British Committee to ensure not only the welfare but also the pleasure of its guests, who shall long remember their delightful week in London.

The following is a translation of a letter we have received from PROFESSOR GUIDO ADLER:

It is with pleasure that I accede to the request of the editor of the Musical Times to give in a few words my impressions of the Congress in London. I can be brief, as I have already dealt at length with it in a feuilleton in the Neue Freie Presse of June 14,* and have given expression to my hopes and their realisation in my speeches at the opening and closing of the festival. In a word, the Congress and Music Festival were in every respect successful. It is true that the scientific part of the proceedings was somewhat overshadowed by the artistic and the social side, but the problem of combining strictly scientific work with a plethora of concerts and social engagements—all within a few days—has never yet been solved, and probably never will be. And yet, there were many interesting lectures and important discussions, to which I cannot refer in detail here. The general programme gave a long list of synopses of the lectures. Perhaps it would have been better to suggest subjects which are at the present time occupying the special attention of musicians, as was done in Vienna. Freedom in the choice of themes is certainly helpful in producing new ideas, but does not tend to concentration of thought. Moreover, it makes impossible any preparation for the discussions, which are frequently so fruitful. I was especially impressed by the singing of the choir from Cambridge, and the exercises given in the lecture on Sol-fa, particularly as the method was essentially English.

For the same reason I was glad that the programmes of the musical performances were, with the exception of the Bach motet, entirely made up of compositions illustrating the history of music in England and her work at the present time. On the Continent we so seldom have an opportunity of hearing English music either classical or modern. In this respect the Congress has done good work, and has been instructive in reminding us that England has not only at different periods in the past achieved much in the development of musical history, but is also doing much honourable and valuable work in the present; while, as Mr. Balfour rightly remarked in his opening speech, the outlook for the future is most hopeful. It may be said that the music performed was very unequal, and that it would have been better to cut down the number of works, but then one knows how difficult it is to draw the line; certainly some contemporary composers would have felt slighted if they had not been given a hearing. I should have preferred to hear in place of the Italian opera—so beautifully sung, acted, and performed at Covent Garden—a national English opera, either classical or modern. L'appétit vient en mangeant. I was astonished at the performance of the Huddersfield Choral Society, but even more so when our President, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, informed me that England possessed several choral societies quite as good. A country with such solid musical foundations, a country that has such excellent vocal teaching, orchestras and military bands which are so artistic, madrigal- and glee-societies trained in the traditions of their craft, a country that boasts such finished solo singers as we heard, that has such a healthy national music (English, Scotch, Irish, and Welsh), such fine academies, and in the Church such artistically perfect ensemble singing—such a country can and will fulfil all the expectations for the future which are founded on the excellent and honourable work of her leaders of to-day. On the scientific side, too, we stand shoulder to shoulder with our English colleagues, who can point to a long line of pioneers. And here I must draw attention to a quality which is not always to be found among us Continentals: modesty, in which lies a powerful factor for future development.

We can only thank our hosts for all the friendliness and good fellowship which has been shown us during the Congress, and for the lavish dispensation of traditional English hospitality which gave us so much pleasure. And if in closing I refer to our warm reception by the ladies of London society, I do so not out of empty politeness, but in recognition of their kindness and in grateful acknowledgment that they bore no small part in making our stay in London a memory we shall ever treasure in head and heart. Thanks, and again thanks!

MR. ALBERT A. STANLEY, Professor of Music, Michigan University, U.S.A., writes to us as follows:

An American who is proud of his unbroken English descent, cannot be expected to consider the events of the memorable days of the International Musical Congress from the point of view of a foreigner. Such an one would prefer to be considered rather as a son, who, after sojourning in far-off lands, again returns to the homeland and notes the many changes which time and progress inevitably bring. Thus he rejoices in all that has made for good, deplors every departure from national ideals, and feels that he has a share in both weal and woe.

As one coming under the above category the writer of these lines claims not only an interest in, but also a part in all that made the week memorable through our English hosts, who have greatly extended the meaning of the word 'hospitality.' Thus—quite distinct from the no less active participation of the real foreigner—that part has in it "no small amount of the pride of race. A meeting-place for those who, coming from a common stock, are working out their artistic problems under differing conditions, was found in the acts of reverence for those early English masters who, as Dr. Wolf pointed out, taught the world. It was a happy thought to make the musical part of the week's programme an outlook over the progress of English music. Covering centuries, as it did, it was an appalling task, and to say it reflected great glory on those who so successfully grappled with the problem is to use an ordinary expression to characterize an extraordinary achievement. There can be no doubt that, lacking the perspective which brought the older works into clearer relations with each other, to make a judicial selection of English music in Bau begriffen was a task transcending the power of any committee. It is more difficult to deal with living composers than with those who have passed on—for which reason one's admiration for the work of the Committee is not unminged with profound sympathy. Whatever may be the opinion of the world regarding modern English music, it has virility, and is not conventional. These are conditions of growth. To say that it reflects the virtues and the faults of modern music, even that written on the other side of the Channel, is but the truth, and a proof of its vigour. Some misguided souls claim that the new has no faults, and the old no virtues. To those who hold this, as well as the opposing view—and they are both wrong—the words† of Sir Hubert Parry should afford food for thought. It is to be hoped that the captious critics who still have open minds will steal away for a quiet hour and absorb Sir Hubert's wisdom, and learn not to be coddled by anything. These remarks are not addressed to professional but to amateur critics. But these inviting bye-paths are opening up such alluring vistas that it will be the part of wisdom to close one's mind to their invitations and return to our purpose. It would be manifestly impossible in anything short of a year's issue of the Sammelbände to give a full review of the scientific, quasi-scientific, and non-scientific offerings from those who, from many countries and in various languages, enlightened the world of music, so the attempt will not be made. On such occasions, certain definite impressions are stamped on one's memory, there to remain. Such impressions are always few in number, but for that reason are more intense. They are useful in establishing a point of view. Three such will be noted here: First, the unbounded hospitality of London, whether official, private, or representative of a guild. It was so ample, so spontaneous, so unassuming, and so genuine, that it placed us all in the position of grateful debtors. If it is more blessed to give than to receive, we may rejoice in the depth of pleasure our hosts must feel. Second, when Sir George Martin, revered of all church musicians, stood in the midst of his choir and directed them with such confident repose—it formed a picture that caused the heart to swell and the eyes to fill with tears. St. Paul's has witnessed few scenes of greater human appeal than this. It was the 'Nunc dimittis' in reality. Third, glorious was the singing of the Huddersfield Choral Society. No more wonderful, more inspiring, choral performance can be imagined than the manner in which through them—as Browning says, 'All through music and me'—S. Wesley's, 'In Exitu Israel,' and Johann Sebastian Bach's, 'Singet dem Herren,' came into their own. Having been told that tears were on the cheeks of some of the singers as they sang the tender choral, 'Like as a father bendeth,' similar manifestations on the part of many of the audience can be accounted for. England has always been great in the direction of choral singing, and so long as such organizations are counted among her musical assets, she has no reason to fear for her undisputed supremacy.

What can we say of Sir Edward Elgar, whom we, on the Western shores of the Atlantic, admire with an enthusiasm which is constantly gaining intensity, and of other English composers, critics and scientists, whom we have known through their works, and have now learned to appreciate as cultured gentlemen, and in some instances as newly-won friends? Nothing in words can express our innermost feelings, but we will cherish them in our hearts. The small party, who, on the Monday following the Congress, were so fortunate as to enjoy a day in the beautiful surroundings of Hatfield Vicarage, and thus had an opportunity of seeing a bit of rural England, would not forgive me did I neglect to follow the implicit directions given me on parting to point out that the genial scientist, the Rev. F. W. Galpin, and his charming wife, gave us what will always be one of our choicest memories.

Occasional Notes.

The Coronation honours include the bestowal of the Order of Merit on Sir Edward Elgar, a knighthood for Dr. Frederic H. Cowen, and Dr. W. G. Alcock is made an M.V.O. (fifth class). All these distinctions are well deserved by their recipients, and they show that musicians and their achievements are appreciated in the highest circles. The inclusion of Sir Edward Elgar in the Order of Merit is a special compliment to the distinguished composer and to the Art he so well represents. The Order was founded by King Edward in 1902. It has been conferred on only about twenty eminent persons. Sir George Trevelyan this year shares the distinction with Sir Edward. It can be granted to either sex, but since Florence Nightingale's death there has been no feminine representative of the Order.

The retrospect of the season's work issued by the Directors of the Queen's Hall Orchestra is a remarkable record of activity. Since August, 1910, the Orchestra has taken part in 165 concerts, of which 24 consisted of outside engagements. The remaining 141 are classified as follows:—61 Promenade Concerts, 31 Sunday Concerts, 13 Symphony Concerts (including the 6 of the London Festival), 9 Concerts at the Festival of Empire, 20 Provincial Concerts (6 at the Sheffield Festival), 7 Concerts at the Glasgow Exhibition. Except on May 24, when Elgar's Symphony and works by Walford Davies and Bantock were produced under the composers' direction, Sir Henry J. Wood has been the conductor of all the concerts. Each of our great British Orchestras has its characteristic merit. That of the Queen's Hall Orchestra is its flexibility, by which it can achieve the finest shades of expression. Its responsiveness to the conductor's beat is singularly complete. To English music its work has been invaluable, and both its fine record and its present high capacity are matters for English musicians to be proud of.

A memorandum on Strict Counterpoint recently issued under the influential auspices of the Union of Graduates contains the following provisions:

- 1.—The parts may cross with reason in Counterpoint for more than two voices.
- 2.—While it is preferable that the first note of the Counterpoint shall make a perfect concord, the use of the third of the chord is not considered to be an offence.
- 3.—Modulation to nearly related keys may be sparingly used after the original key has been established.
- 4.—Syncopation, in examples of the fourth species, may occasionally be broken.
- 5.—When writing Combined Counterpoint, dotted minims and dotted crotchets may be used (the latter sparingly) in the fifth species.
- 6.—A crotchet should be seldom tied to a crotchet.
- 7.—Two chords may be used in a bar, although it is recognized that the use of one chord in a bar is often stronger in effect.
- 8.—More than two consecutive quavers should not be used; and these groups of two quavers should occur on the 2nd and 4th beats of the bar in conjunct motion.
- 9.—A skip of an octave to the first of a group of two quavers is permissible. In all other cases quavers should be approached and quitted in conjunct motion.
- 10.—Changing notes may be used; but except in the Cadence they should be rare.
- 11.—A second inversion should not occur on the first beat of any bar, unless the fourth of the chord having been previously prepared, is resolved in the same bar.
- 12.—The objection to consecutive perfect fifths does not depend on the number of notes intervening, but on the character of the fifths themselves; for instance, two perfect fifths are always permissible with one or more notes intervening, provided that at least one of the fifths is unessential.

GENERAL NOTE.—It is not, in our experience, sufficiently borne in mind that anything in the nature of a 'licence' should be used with reservation.

This is the welcome outcome of the growing feeling that some standardization of the rules of Counterpoint was necessary. It will be of great help and reassurance to students if the system outlined is adopted by the various examination bodies, and we cannot doubt that the weight of authority represented by the names of Sir Walter Parratt, Sir Frederick Bridge, Dr. Buck, Dr. J. C. Bridge, Dr. Walter Carroll, Dr. Harding, Dr. C. H. Lloyd and Dr. Pearce will ensure its universal recognition. The memorandum can be obtained by applying to Mr. E. F. Horner, the Hon. Sec. of the Union of Graduates, 19 Beverley Road, Anerley, S.E.

Mr. Nikisch, who has expressed unbounded admiration for Sir Edward Elgar's new Symphony, has arranged to conduct performances in Berlin and Hamburg. Other Continental performances have also been settled to take place at Vienna and Munich. Performances in the United States are in course of negotiation.

The Symphony has now been performed four times in London, and it is significant that the latest performances have excited the greatest enthusiasm. New beauties of structure and treatment have been revealed, and increased familiarity has enabled auditors to realise the relations of its parts to the whole and, while listening, to enjoy the pleasures of anticipation.

Many music-lovers will learn with a pang of regret that the Magpie Madrigal Society, which was formed in 1886, is now disbanded. Mr. Lionel H. Benson, who has been the conductor during the whole period of the Society's existence, thinks that for the time being it has accomplished its mission in introducing a great number of madrigals and other a cappella works. A handsome memorial volume, giving a full record of the doings of the Society, has been issued privately. Lists of all the members and all the pieces performed are included. The volume affords more scope for comment than we are able at present to avail ourselves of. We shall return to the subject, and, meantime, we offer our congratulations and thanks to Mr. Lionel Benson for what he has done for the cause of vocal music, and we cherish a hope that he will some day find it possible to form another madrigal choir.

M. Edmond Michotte, director of the Brussels Conservatoire, has presented to the institution his large collection of letters and manuscript scores by Rossini. Some of the works have never been published. Those whom it may interest will be glad to learn that Herr Ranschberg has discovered at Vienna thirty-seven autograph letters by Gluck, written between 1775-1783, addressed to the Austrian ambassador at Paris. The letters are said to contain much valuable biographical information.

Among Gustav Mahler's posthumous compositions are his ninth Symphony, in four movements, and the 'Lied von der Erde,' a cycle of songs for alto and tenor with orchestral accompaniment. Both of these will shortly be published. His musical manuscripts, the examination and editing of which has been entrusted to his pupil Herr Bruno Walter, also include a choral work 'Das klagende Lied' and a number of songs.

The development of the belief in the value of ear-training and sight-singing is eloquently shown by the new syllabus on these topics issued by the Associated Board. There are graded requirements for six divisions, from the primary class to the most advanced. A significant feature of the syllabus is the repeated reference to the tonic sol-fa modulator and notation, and even that bête noire the lah minor, is recognized. The syllabus is analysed in the July School Music Review. We are all tonic sol-faists now!

Sir Henry J. Wood was married on June 19 at the Church of St. Mary the Virgin, Hampstead, to Miss Muriel Greatrex. The musician's many friends will join in wishing happiness to him and his spouse.

Church and Organ Music.

MR. F. A. W. DOCKER, F.R.A.M.

The experiences of any man who has occupied the same position in his profession for forty years must surely be of instructive value to his fellows. Matters of historical and professional interest necessarily crowd themselves into such a life, from which much may be learned, not only by those taking their first steps, but by many who have lived through the same period, engaged in similar work. Indeed, the latter would probably estimate more correctly the characteristics which such long service demands. The church organist has a somewhat difficult position to maintain, in view of inevitable changes of style in the composition and performance of music specially written for use in church. He must possess much tact, and the faculty of adapting himself to varying conditions. His chief work lies in the training and management of his choir, to which his powers as an organist are supplementary, though to-day much is expected of him as an executant.

There is probably no London organist better known than Mr. F. A. W. Docker, whose portrait we have the pleasure of including below. But if it be unnecessary to introduce him to our readers, the fact of his having, with conspicuous success, held the post of organist and choirmaster of St. Andrew's, Wells Street, for no less than forty years (he actually became a chorister there in 1862) entitles him to very special mention. Mr. Docker was born on August 14, 1852, and began his musical training at the age of five. After his choristership at St. Andrew's, he became an articulated pupil of and assistant-organist to Sir Joseph (then Mr.) Barnby. Entering as a student at the Royal Academy, of which Sir William Sterndale Bennett was then the Principal, he studied under Sir Arthur (then Mr.) Sullivan, Dr. Steggall, and Mr. W. H. Holmes.

During his period at the Academy the Oratorio Concerts at Exeter Hall were inaugurated, with Sir J. Barnby as conductor, and Mr. Docker as organist. On leaving the Academy he received the Associateship diploma from Sir W. Sterndale Bennett. At the age of nineteen he succeeded Sir J. Barnby as organist and choirmaster of St. Andrew's, and took every advantage of the excellent position to which he had, by sheer merit, attained. He was particularly successful as a conductor, and was at the head of many choral societies, among them being the Sydenham Amateur Choral Society. He was preceded in this latter office by such men as Franklin Taylor and Thomas Whigham.

On the formation of the Handel Society in 1882, Mr. Docker was appointed the first conductor of the choir, a position he held for ten years. At the performance by the Society in 1884 of 'Saul,' commemorating the bi-centenary of Handel's birth, His late Majesty King Edward VII. most graciously complimented the conductor in person upon the performance. Upon retiring from the Society in 1892, Mr. Docker was presented with an address, accompanied by a handsome testimonial. Among the signatures were those of Sir John Stainer (second President of the Society), the Earl of Lathom, and the Right Hon. A. J. Balfour, with many others. This was followed by the bestowal of the honour of Fellow of the Royal Academy of Music by Sir Alexander Mackenzie. Mr. Docker was appointed conductor of the Kyrle Society Choir in 1886, their performances having done much to educate those in the poorer districts of London. In 1895 Sir Joseph Barnby appointed him a professor of the organ at the Guildhall School of Music, and, in 1896, on the completion of twenty-five years' service at St. Andrew's, a very handsome testimonial from the clergy, choir, churchwardens, and members of the congregation, was presented to him.

Turning to the services at St. Andrew's, Mr. Docker's musical attainments have been greatly responsible for the wide reputation the Church enjoys, while his personality largely helped to contribute to his success amongst those with whom he has worked for so long. The duties include not only, of course, full choral services on Sundays, but (excepting Mondays) two daily choral services. For these a large and varied repertoire is necessary, and provided for by a long list including the best of old and new settings of the Canticles, and an extensive selection of anthems. The list is a formidable one, including at least 200 services, and upwards of 500 anthems. Gounod's sacred music was introduced into this country first at St. Andrew's, and on the composer's visit to the church in 1871, Mr. Docker was at the organ, Gounod and Sir J. Barnby in turn conducting. Several unknown works by Schubert have been first introduced at St. Andrew's under Mr. Docker's direction, and it was to the words of the late Rev. Benjamin Webb, former Vicar of St. Andrew's, that he adapted and published the well-known anthems, 'Where Thou reignest,' 'Lord, in thankful love,' and 'Blessed Jesu,' from the 'Stabat Mater,' Dvorák. His adaptations of the Masses of Haydn, Mozart, Schubert and Gounod to English words have had no small influence on their popularity, while the performances of these works at St. Andrew's are still amongst the best to be heard to-day in London churches. Further, he has not been idle in the matter of composition, his works including the anthems 'Sing we merrily,' 'O ye that love the Lord,' and an 'Ave verum,' while he has written a Te Deum and Benedictus in G, and Evening Service in B flat, and several smaller examples.

His skill as a soloist is remarkable, and we recall his performance some years ago of Widor's Toccata in F as quite the cleanest we ever heard. As an accompanist he has few equals, while his skill as a choir-trainer is obvious from the excellent results obtained by his methods. It is only necessary to read his 'Short History of Church Music' to discover his ideal of what that music should be, and the lofty motives which prompt him.

Such a record should be an encouragement to our younger organists to persevere in the position they may hold, unless it become absolutely untenable. We have always felt that to be constantly changing one's ground leads in the end to disappointment and failure. Henry Smart said that 'it takes five years to work the last man out and another five to work oneself in,' and we believe it to be true. The list of St. Andrew's organists from 1847, when the church was dedicated, is as follows:—Richard Redhead, John Foster, Philip Armes, Henry Bennett, Joseph Bamby, F. A. W. Docker. To this may we add the hope that it may be long before the list is added to.

The new organ recently built for Clifton College Chapel by Messrs. Harrison & Harrison (of Durham and London), was dedicated in May last by the Lord Bishop of Hereford, and must undoubtedly rank as one of the finest instruments in the country. It is certainly one of the best this firm has produced, which is high praise indeed. During the day two recitals were given by Dr. W. G. Alcock, who selected programmes well exhibiting the tonal and mechanical possibilities of the organ, while a crowded audience was present on each occasion. The instrument is the munificent gift of Mr. H. H. Wills, of Barley Wood, Winton, Somerset, an old Cliftonian. The specification, which we hope to quote fully in our issue for August, was drawn up by the builders in consultation with Mr. A. H. Peppin, organist of the College.

PRESENTATION TO DR. H. W. RICHARDS.

On June 19, a gathering of members of the congregation of Christ Church, Lancaster Gate, presented a testimonial to Dr. H. W. Richards, the well-known organist of that Church, on the completion of twenty-five years' work there. The presentation was made by the Bishop of Chichester, (Dr. Ridgeway, the former Vicar), with whom Dr. Richards had been associated for twenty of those years. He spoke most warmly and appreciatively of Dr. Richards's faithful and devoted labours in the service of the Church and of his talents and skill, which had raised the music to its present very high level. He also expressed his admiration for Dr. Richards's courage in performing his tasks often under great difficulties, handicapped as he had been by constant ill-health. Sometimes, he concluded, Bishops were called upon to do many things they did not like, but he was going that afternoon to do something he liked very much, and that was to give Dr. Richards a small mark of the gratitude and appreciation of the people of Christ Church for all he had done for the music of the Church.

The Bishop then handed Dr. Richards a book containing the names of the donors, and a purse with cheque for £200 15s. 6d.

The present Vicar, Prebendary Gardow, also spoke, referring especially to the changes which had taken place a year ago, when, at the request of himself and the Churchwardens, Dr. Richards had consented to fill the post of choirmaster as well as that of organist. Owing to Dr. Richards's unfailing patience and resource, the music and singing had now reached a very high standard.

Dr. Richards returned his thanks most warmly for the gift and for the kind words of the Bishop and the Vicar, and spoke with much feeling of the unfailing kindness, consideration and sympathy he had ever met with from all connected with the Church. He would continue to make it his endeavour to carry out the ideal he had always set before himself—that of making the Christ Church services reverent and helpful to devotion.

The forty-first annual Festival of the London Gregorian Choral Association took place at St. Paul's Cathedral on June 8. The thousand voices of the massed-choir were heard in examples of the Plain-song which they cultivate, and in a selection of anthems and hymns and other pieces in which Palestrina's 'Come, Thou Holy Spirit, come' and Handel's 'Zadok the Priest' were included. The conductor was Mr. Francis Burgess.

The

Competition Festival Record

No. 36.

YORK.—April 29 and May 12.

The annual Festival inaugurated by Miss Mary Egerton was this year combined with the Yorkshire Challenge Shield Competition, and the result was very successful. The chief choral day was on the 29th. Eight female-voice choirs competed, the tests being 'Distant bells' (Mackenzie) and the 'A March night' (Brahms). Armley, under Mr. Pickard, came first, and Mr. Wilkinson's choir was second. Five male-voice choirs entered in the open section, the tests being 'What care I' (Blumenthal) or 'Bind my brows' (Stainer), and an own-choice piece. Cleveland Harmonic gave a splendid performance and gained the first place, the Leeds Musical Union coming second. In the mixed-voice class all the choirs had to sing Granville Bantock's part-song 'On Himalay' and Healey Willan's 'My little pretty one,' and an own-choice piece. Armley was again successful, with 208 marks, St. Michael-le-Belfrey Choir gained 204 marks, and St. Wilfred's Choir 202. The singing was exceptionally good. On the second day village choirs and schools competed. In the small village section, Naburn (Mr. H. Calvert) was first; and in an elementary section for female-voice choirs Wighill gained a victory. The village schools were only sparsely represented. The town schools brought some good results, St. Paul's School, York, Poppleton C. S. (Mr. Appleby), Harrogate (Mr. J. Wade) were among the prize-winners. In the large village class there were six choirs, and Harewood (Mr. J. Cawood) was first. A challenge cup competition, in which the tests were 'Cuckou' (Old English) and 'Daughter of Kings' (Elgar) displayed some exceptionally good results. North Fryston was first and Healaugh was second. In an anthem class Hovingham secured first place. Dr. McNaught adjudicated on the first two days, and Mr. Harry Evans on the third day.

At a concert given on the last day, Elgar's 'Coronation Ode' was given by the combined choirs, under Mr. T. Tertius Noble, the York Symphony Orchestra furnishing the accompaniments. A miscellaneous selection followed.

The Festival owes much to the devotion and business capacity of Mr. E. C. Brooksbank, the honorary secretary.

SEVENOAKS (West Kent).

May 2 and 3.

The West Kent Festival was held for the tenth time on the above date. The entries were numerous and varied, comprising instrumental chamber music and solos, and school choirs in several grades, and adult choirs of varied constitution. Dr. McNaught adjudicated in the vocal classes, and Mr. Gerald Walenn in the instrumental classes. Hildenborough Chevening were amongst the successful school choirs, and St. Peter's Seal, Wateringbury and West Malling were successful in the adult classes. The chief choral competition resulted in a victory for the Sevenoaks Society. In the female-voice choir class Sevenoaks was again successful. There was much excellent playing in the string and quartet classes. A performance of H. Goetz's beautiful cantata, 'By the waters of Babylon,' with a small string band and pianoforte accompaniment, was very successful in revealing the beauties of the work. Dr. McNaught conducted.

FEIS CEOIL, DUBLIN, 1911.

The Feis Ceoil, held on May 8 and following days, was the fifteenth Festival and showed a continued and increased interest on the part of the public. The total entries amounted to 614. The judges were Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson (choral); Mr. H. Plunket Greene and Signor Denza (solo vocal); Mr. Sigmund Beel (strings); Mr. Franklin Taylor (pianoforte); and Mr. J. Ord Hume (brass band and wind instruments).

The Choral Prizes were awarded as follows:

DIVISION I.—MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (2 entries).

The Maiden City Choir, Londonderry (Mr. A. J. Cunningham).

DIVISION I.—MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (4 entries).

1st. The Maiden City Male Choir, Londonderry (Mr. A. J. Cunningham).

2nd. Augustinian Choral Society, Dublin (Mr. J. B. Van Craen).

DIVISION I.—LADIES' CHOIRS (5 entries).

1st. Miss Culwick's Ladies' Choir, Dublin (Miss Florence Culwick).

2nd. Maiden City Ladies' Choir, Londonderry (Mr. A. J. Cunningham).

DIVISION II.—MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (2 entries).

1st. Augustinian Choral Society, Dublin (Mr. J. B. Van Craen).

DIVISION II.—LADIES' CHOIRS (3 entries).

1st. Enniskillen Choir (Mr. H. H. Hallowes).

2nd. Dominican Convent, Sion Hill, Blackrock (Mr. Robert O'Dwyer).

DIVISION III.—MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (3 entries).

1st. G. S. & W. Railway Choir, Dublin (Mr. Samuel Hewson).

2nd. 'Father Matthew' Mixed Choir, Dublin (Mr. Peter P. Walsh).

DIVISION III.—MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (2 entries).

1st. Carmelite Choral Society, Dublin (Mr. Peter P. Walsh).

DIVISION III.—LADIES' CHOIRS (4 entries).

1st. Maryborough Choral Union (Mr. J. B. Van Craen).

2nd. Messrs. W. and R. Jacobs' Choral Society (Mr. Thomas H. Weaving).

In the solo competitions the following awards were made:

The Denis O'Sullivan Memorial Medal.—Miss Jeannie V. Nolan (Dublin).

The Plunket Greene Cup (for interpretation).—Miss Edith Mortier (Dublin).

The Stanley Cochrane Prize of six months' vocal tuition at Milan.—Mr. F. Cecil Simms (Londonderry), baritone.

The O'Donoghue of the Glens Cup.—Miss Nellie Moore (Dublin), second year.

The Ladies' Committee Prize of one year's free tuition at the R.C.M., London.—Miss Nellie Moore (Dublin), soprano.

The O'Mara Cup.—Mr. J. S. Litholder (Dublin), bass.

The Esposito Prize of £10 for Advanced Pianoforte Playing was awarded to Miss Edith French (Dublin).

In the children's choir competition there were five entries, and prizes were won by:

- 1st. St. Mary's Girls' School, Fairview, Dublin (Miss Mary Dardis).
- 2nd. Donnybrook Mixed National School (Mr. Samuel McElroy).

TUNBRIDGE WELLS.—May 9, 10.

Although the entries showed a falling-off in the junior section, the second North-East Sussex and Tunbridge Wells Competitive Festival was in general an advance upon the previous event. The adjudicator was Dr. McNaught, who awarded the first-prizes to the following choirs.

JUNIOR CLASSES.

East Grinstead (Challenge Banner), Hartfield, Hurst Green, Frant, St. John's Crowborough, East Grinstead (sight-singing), and Hurst Green (sight-singing).

ADULT CLASSES.

Male choirs (open), The Chanters; (village), Wadhurst. Ladies' choirs (village), Hurst Green (Miss H. M. Egerton); (open), Mrs. Bisshopp's choir. Church choirs (open), King Charles-the-Martyr, Tunbridge Wells; (village), Wadhurst. Choral Societies (small villages), Withyham. Choral Societies (large villages), Wadhurst. Choral Societies (open, two classes), Wadhurst and Mrs. Bisshopp's choir.

Madrigal and Sight-reading, Mrs. Bisshopp's choir.

Handel's 'Samson' was very successfully performed by the combined choirs with orchestral accompaniment. Miss Hilda Foster, Mr. Sidney Coltham, and Dr. Aikin were the soloists, and Dr. McNaught conducted. The Duchess of Norfolk distributed the prizes.

ILKLEY.—May 11—13.

In this beautifully situated town the competitive Festival idea seems to have taken strong root. The entries occupied three full days, and brought forward much excellent talent. All the business side of the Festival was well organized, under the skilful direction of Mr. Akeroyd and Dr. W. R. Bates, the secretaries. Dr. McNaught was the principal adjudicator, but Professor Granville Bantock kindly deputised on one day in order to enable Dr. McNaught to rehearse the Huddersfield Choir for the London Congress. The chief tests and results were as follows:

CHORAL SOCIETIES (Village).

Tests: 'When whispering strains' (Charles Wood). 'Dainty, fine, sweet nymph' (T. Morley).

- 1st. Ilkley St. Cecilia Society (Mr. A. T. Akeroyd).
- Pool Choral Union (Mr. E. A. Midgley).

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Village).

Tests: 'Fairy dance' (Corder).

'Summer wind' (MacDowell).

- 2nd. Burley-in-Wharfedale Choral Society (Mr. F. J. P. Drake).
- 1st. Pool Choral Union (Mr. E. A. Midgley).
- St. Margaret's Hall Girls' Club (Mrs. Lomax).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

(Twenty to thirty-six voices.)

Tests: 'I dare not ask a kiss' (Ed. C. Bairstow).

'Song of freedom' (Frank Davidson).

- 1st. Habergam Glee Union (Mr. E. Hitchon).
- York Male-Voice Choir (Mr. H. G. Wilkinson).
- 2nd. Nelson Arion (Mr. Lawson Berry).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS.

(Not more than 40 voices.)

Tests: 'How sweet the moonlight' (Eaton Fanning).

'All creatures now are merry-minded' (J. Bennett).

- 1st. Armley (Mr. Harry Pickard).
- 3rd. Brighouse Glee and Madrigal (Mr. Arthur Nettleton).
- Burley-in-Wharfedale (Mr. F. J. P. Drake).
- Eccleshill Prize Choir (Mr. J. T. Wilcock).
- Ilkley St. Cecilia (Mr. A. T. Akeroyd).
- 2nd. Thornton Vocal Union (Mr. W. Lloyd Ashton).

The School results are recorded elsewhere in the SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW.

CORNWALL COUNTY.—May 15—20.

Though this was only the second year of the existence under present conditions of the Cornwall County Music Competitions, it had been so admirably organized during the year that this year's Festival showed remarkable growth from the good beginning of 1910. The contests extended over six days in three centres—Camborne for the western division and Bodmin for the eastern, with instrumental classes at Truro as central for both. The entries totalled over 200, the greater proportion being received from the western side. The elementary schools were well represented in all classes, but lack of response from choral societies and from church and chapel choirs in many cases prevented competition. The lowest standard was found in sight-reading; in outstanding cases—Bodmin and Camborne—a high standard of choral singing was reached. The voice quality generally had vitality and resonance, the basses almost invariably, especially in the western division, being very fine. The People's Palace Male-Voice Choir (Truro) realised the highest all-round excellence of performance in the choral tests. The highest standard attained throughout the Festival was reached in the chamber music playing at Truro, which the adjudicators, Dr. H. P. Allen and Dr. Somervell, described as nearly perfect as could be.

ADULT CHOIRS (CAMBORNE).

Choirs from small towns:

(Mixed-voice choirs, part-song), Devoran; (Mixed-voice choirs, chorus), St. Gluvias; (Girls' clubs), St. Day; (Ladies' choirs), St. Day (Mrs. Martyn); (Male-voice choirs), Marazion.

Choirs from large towns:

(Mixed-voice choirs, chorus), Truro, St. Mary's Wesleyan; (Mixed-voice choirs, part-song), Mr. Pearce's choir, Camborne; (Sight-reading), Mr. Pearce's choir; (Girls' clubs), Mrs. Bennett's class, Camborne; (Ladies' choirs, eight entries), St. Mary's Wesleyan, Truro; (Mr. J. H. Williams); (Male-voice choirs), equal, Truro People's Palace (Mr. Wallace Smith) and Marazion (Mr. J. H. Trudgeon).

ADULT CHOIRS (BODMIN).

(Mixed-voice choirs, small villages), Sticker; (A.T.B. choirs, one entry), Bodmin Choral Society (Mr. R. Glendinning); (Girls' clubs, one entry), Liskeard (Mrs. Foster); (Ladies' choirs), equal, Mrs. C. Rawling's choir, Saltash, and the Rev. J. Shirren's choir, St. Breock; (Choirs of men and boys), Saltash (Mrs. C. Rawling); (Male-voice choirs), Probus (Dr. S. Tucker).

ORCHESTRAL COMPETITIONS (TRURO).

(String orchestras), The 'Sevick' Orchestra (Miss Bertha Treweek); (Orchestras with wood-wind, &c.), Redruth Wesleyan Y.M.B.C. (Mr. H. Dennis).

The School results are recorded elsewhere in the SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW.

HASTINGS.—May 22, 23, 24.

This was a very successful event. It demonstrated that there was excellent capacity in the area appealed to. Nearly one thousand individuals were concerned in the entries. On the first day there was much solo-playing and singing, and some very good elementary school singing. St. Paul's (Miss F. W. Bruce) gave excellent performances of 'Sweet and low' (Selby) and 'A bird sang' (Rogers), and won a prize. On the second day there was also solo-singing, the most successful appearance being that of a young girl (Miss Prichard) in the alto class, the test for which was Elgar's 'Where corals lie.' The choral section brought forward three well-equipped choirs. The tests were 'The pilgrims' (Henry Leslie) and 'Full fathom five' (Charles Wood). The Hastings Madrigal Society, under Dr. Brearley, gave fine performances, and earned the first place. Dr. McNaught adjudicated on the first two days, but unexpectedly he had to be in London on the third day, and Mr. Percy Fletcher was fortunately able to take his place. On this day there were mainly solo classes. A young girl, Miss Edith Churton, distinguished herself as a violoncello player, and a boy, Master Emil C. B. Clark, showed talent as a pianist. Mr. John Loeckey is the honorary secretary of the Festival, which has now entered its third year. Both he and his committee are to be congratulated.

PRINCE ALBERT (CANADA).

The Saskatchewan Provincial Musical Festival took place here, terminating on May 24. The results were of a nature to give general satisfaction, and in some cases, surprise at their excellence. The chief prize-winners in the choral classes were St. Paul's Choir, Regina; Prince Albert Baptist Choir; Saskatoon Y.M.C.A.; Alban's Ladies' College. The solo-singing classes had different sections for amateurs and professionals; the winners were Miss S. Aird and Mrs. F. W. Jackson (sopranos), Mrs. O. Albrechtsen (mezzo-soprano), Miss S. Tait (contralto), Mr. G. A. Baylist and Mr. R. A. Bridgman (tenor), Mr. C. Stewart and the Rev. T. A. Horne (baritone), Mr. F. T. Viney and Mr. A. S. Newcombe (bass). The massed choirs sang choruses from Spohr's 'Last Judgment' at the final concert. It was decided to hold the next Provincial Festival at Moose Jaw.

BUXTON MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—May 25—27.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Buxton occupies a very strong strategical position as a centre for competitive festival work. Serving a district stretching from the eastern border of Cheshire, across Derbyshire, right up to the Trent, verging on Yorkshire borders on the north side and Staffordshire in the south, its potentialities for musical propaganda are great indeed. Well served by railway companies, the town is undoubtedly attractive in itself, and the large hall in the gardens is well adapted for the purposes of a festival, yet the feeling is strong that the best use is not being made of the possibilities of the situation. Possibly an infusion of the more energetic spirit characteristic of some of the west-coast festivals would do something to bring about this desirable end. In the children's classes there is much good work being done. Professor Bantock spoke of the danger of the old folk-songs being allowed to die out, and Council Schools had it in their power not only to prevent such a calamity but actually to lead to a revival of such ballads as 'The flight of the earls' (sung in the Elementary School Class). The singing on the closing day brought to notice the singular gifts of Mr. W. Turner and his quite youthful female-voice choir from Nottingham. Once again it demonstrated the fact that under right and wise guidance the musical sensibilities of merely normal children may be trained to quite a remarkable degree of perfection. If only school-choir-trainers such as have been brought to light so far in this twentieth century could be multiplied indefinitely! Mr. Harry Evans was Professor Bantock's colleague, Mr. Paul Le Vallon also assisting in some of the solo classes. The tests, entries and results in the chief classes were as follows:

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

Test: 'It is not always May' (Pinsuti).

- 1st. Tideswell (Mr. Carl Ashover).
- 2nd. Bradwell (Mr. Horace Reynolds).
St. Peter's Choral Society, Eckington (Mr. Reynolds).
Mellor Choral Society (Mr. Herbert Wilde).
Curbar Church (Mr. E. Barnsdall).

CLASSES FOR CHURCH AND CHAPEL CHOIRS.

First-prize winners:

Buxton Wesley.
St. Mary's, Buxton.
St. James', Higher Sutton.
Buxton Congregational (Mr. T. Dawson).

CHORAL SOCIETIES.

Tests: 'A slumber song' (Lohr).
'O God, when Thou appearest' (Mozart).

- 1st. Buxton Philharmonic (Mr. G. H. Lockett).
- 2nd. St. Peter's Choral Society, Eckington (Mr. H. Reynolds).
Bradwell (Mr. H. Reynolds).
Tideswell (Mr. Carl Ashover).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

Test: 'Glory and love to the men of old.'

- 1st. Buxton Philharmonic.

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Chief Class).

Test: 'A song of morning' (Mackenzie).

- 1st. Hanley and District (Mr. E. C. Redfern).
- 2nd. Mr. W. Turner's Girls' Prize Choir (Nottingham).
Nottingham Philharmonic (Mr. W. Turner).
Hadyn Vocal Society (Madame Edwards).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Chief Class).

Test: 'The old hunter' (Brahms).

'Give a rouse' (Bantock).

- 1st. Church Gresley P.M. (Mr. G. Walton).
- 2nd. Salford (Mr. David Grundy).
- 3rd. Manchester Mendelssohn (Mr. A. W. Lomas).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS.

Tests: 'On Himalay' (Bantock).

'Give a rouse' (Bantock).

- 1st. Nottingham Philharmonic (Mr. W. Turner).
- 2nd. Tideswell (Mr. Carl Ashover).
Hanley and District (Mr. E. C. Redfern).
Buxton Philharmonic (Mr. G. H. Lockett).

The chief solo prize-winners were the following:

Soprano, 26 entries (Miss M. A. Warde).
Alto, 24 entries (Miss Laura Dryden).
Tenor, 29 entries (Mr. W. H. Seal).
Bass, 32 entries (Mr. G. H. Crosland).
Pianoforte (open) Miss Nettie M. Thomson.

The School results are recorded elsewhere in the SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW.

WARRINGTON.—May 27.

This Festival, held on one day, suffered from plethora of entries. But notwithstanding these difficulties the management succeeded in arranging the business satisfactorily. Many first-rate choirs came, and the competition was keen. The secretary, Mr. R. W. Cook, and his committee, are to be congratulated on the confidence they have inspired. Dr. W. G. McNaught and Mr. F. H. Crossley adjudicated. The following are the chief tests, entries, and results:

CHILDREN'S CHOIRS.

Test: 'Oh! the flowery month of June' (Jackson).

- Brook Street S. S. (Mr. W. Barton).
- Eccles Co-operative Juvenile Choir (Mr. J. Currie).
- Sutton Juvenile Choir (Mr. E. R. Griffiths).
- Warrington Band of Hope Juvenile Choir (Mr. A. Spruce).
- Bewsey Road Wesleyan Juvenile Choir (Mr. W. Hipkiss).
- Stockton Heath Council School (Mr. F. Brook).
- 1st. Warrington Secondary School (Mr. R. H. Albery).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

Tests: 'To Celia' (C. Lee Williams).

'The long day closes' (Sullivan).

- Wigan Harmonic (Mr. E. C. Robinson).
- Blackley Co-operative (Mr. F. Sheriff).
- 2nd. Warrington Apollo (Mr. F. Hickman).
- 3rd. Denton (Mr. A. Yates).
- 1st. Gorton (Mr. T. Corlett).
- Mossley Clarion (Mr. S. Buckley).
- Warrington (Mr. W. S. Nesbitt).
- St. Helen's Glee Club (Dr. S. B. Siddall).

LADIES' CHOIRS.

Test: 'The Snow' (Elgar).

- 3rd. Earlestown (Mr. W. Turner).
- Stretford (Mr. T. Corlett).
- Blackley Co-operative (Mr. F. Sheriff).
- Delf Co-operative (Mr. J. Shaw).
- 2nd. Runcorn and Widnes (Mr. R. T. Edwards).
- 1st. Sale and District Musical Society (Mr. A. Higson).
- Mossley Vocal Society (Mr. J. Shaw).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS.

Tests: 'Let their celestial concerts all unite' ('Samson,' Handel).
'Who is Sylvia?' (German).

- South Manchester (Mr. W. P. Redmayne).
Preston Vocal Union (Mr. W. Tattersall).
3rd. Stretford Glee and Madrigal (Mr. T. Corlett).
Blackley Co-operative (Mr. T. Sheriff).
1st. Southport Choir (Mr. W. Tattersall).
Delph Co-operative (Mr. J. Shaw).
Runcorn and Widnes Co-operative (Mr. R. T. Edwards).
2nd. Sale and District (Mr. A. Higson).
Mossley Vocal Society (Mr. J. Shaw).
* Bolton Co-operative (Mr. A. Knight).
* Holders of the Challenge Shield.

Both Southport and Sale gave exceptionally fine performances. They were separated by only one mark.

MEIFOD—June 8.

The Powys Provincial Eisteddfod, held this year in the pleasant vale of Meifod, attracted excellent entries and large audiences. The programme ranged from competitions in Welsh epigrams, designs for the back of a bardic chair, and the making of gentlemen's shooting stockings to choral contests. The prizes in the latter were won by Llanfyllin Male-Voice Choir (Mr. J. P. Williams); (Village choirs, 6 entries), Parti Banwy and Côr y Llan, equal; (Children's choirs, 7 entries), Llanfihangel (Mr. C. E. Shimmmin); (Mixed-voice choirs, 3 entries), Llanfihangel (Rev. J. R. Roberts). The adjudicator was Mr. Dan Price.

LEAMINGTON.—June 8, 9, 10.

This was the first Festival of its kind held in this pleasant town. It was undertaken with some trepidation at the suggestion of Mr. J. Gregson, formerly of Lytham, and it succeeded quite remarkably. The commodious and handsome public hall was lent for the purpose by the local Council, and the Mayor supported the undertaking by his presence. The honorary secretaries were Mr. Joseph Gregson and Mr. E. Hicks, and the managing secretary was Mrs. Bernard Green. The adjudicators were Dr. McNaught, Mr. Granville Humphreys and Mr. W. McNaught. On the children's day the hall was thronged with school choirs. The singing was always tuneful, and sometime reached a high standard. Solo singers and players came forward in great numbers, but the most remarkable capture of the Festival was the entry of fifteen male-voice choirs in one section.

The school results are recorded elsewhere in the SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW. The chief results in the adult section were as follows:

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

- Tests: 'O peaceful night' (Edward German).
'Hymn before action' (Walford Davies).
4th. Leamington Male-Voice Choir.
Warwick Orpheus Society.
3rd. Coventry Male-Voice Musical Club.
Rugby Male-Voice Choir.
Balsall Heath Glee Singers, Sparkhill, Birmingham.
The Norton Glee-men, Saltley.
West Bromwich Male-Voice Choir.
Oldbury Early Morning School Male-Voice Choir, Birmingham.
Sapcote Orpheus Male Choir, Stoney Stanton.
Earl Shilton Institute Choir, Hinckley.
1st. Church Gresley Primitive Methodist Male-Voice Choir, Burton-on-Trent.
Manfield's Factory Choir, Northampton.
Northampton Male-Voice Choir.
Primrose Hill Congregational Choir, Northampton.
2nd. Swadlincote and District Male-Voice Choir, Church Gresley.

CHORAL SOCIETIES (A).

Tests: 'Thy voice, O harmony' (Webbe).
'O happy eyes' (Elgar).

- Mr. Johnson Peters' Choir, Birmingham.
Mr. Luttman's Private Choir, Banbury.
1st. Coventry Co-operative Festival Choir (Conductor, Mr. John Potter).
2nd. Rugby Co-operative Choral Society.
Mr. Potter's choir displayed great finish and fine tone. It is an organization fit to go into any competition with confidence.

CHORAL SOCIETIES (B).

Tests: 'In silent night' (arr. Brahms).
'Love, fare thee well' (arr. Brahms).

- 2nd. Spencer Street Church Choir, Leamington.
1st. Manfield's Factory Choir, Northampton.
Mr. Johnson Peters' Choir, Birmingham.
Primrose Hill Congregational Choir, Northampton.

JUNIOR COMPETITION.

The entries and results were as follows:

SECTION B.

Tests: 'Rock-a-bye' (Parry).
'The wind' (Rathbone).

- Lillington Mixed School.
1st. Portland Street, Leamington, Wesleyan Day School.
St. Matthew's, Rugby, Band of Hope.

SECTION C.

Tests: Unison, 'Will you walk a little faster' (Macdonald).
Two-part, 'The robin' (Granville Bantock).

- 1st. Milverton Mixed Schools, Leamington.
2nd. Shrubland Street Girls', Leamington.
Shrubland Street Boys, Leamington.
Clapham Terrace, Leamington, Mixed School.
Leicester Street Boys, Leamington.
The Murray School, Rugby.
Elborrow School, Rugby.

ACTION-SONGS (Own-choice).

Portland Street Wesleyan Day School, Leamington.
Shrubland Street Girls, Leamington.
( 'Housemaids.' )
Leicester Street Girls', Leamington.
National Mixed School, Leamington.
( 'Merry Maids.' )

Only the Shrubland Street and National Mixed Schools appeared. Both sang charmingly, maintaining the pitch admirably, although the heat was very oppressive. The two schools were declared equal. Dr. McNaught adjudicated.

In our last issue it was erroneously stated that Sir Edward Elgar adjudicated at Morecambe. His name was on the list of adjudicators, but he was unable to attend.

The Seventh Annual Preston Musical Competitive Festival will take place on November 23, 24 and 25.

In our issue for May, in the report of the Coleraine Festival, it should have been stated that the Kelly Memorial School (Miss McCreedy), not the Nash Street School, tied with the Irish Society's School.

The Lytham Festival was held with its usual success on June 14 to 17.

At Glasgow during Coronation week a new Festival drew an extraordinary number of entries, necessitating many preliminary competitions. Both these events will be reported in our next issue.

DINNER TO MR. FULLER MAITLAND.

A dinner to Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland, on his retirement from the post of chief musical critic to The Times, was given by the Concert-Goers' Club at the Hotel Cecil on June 14. The Lord Chief Justice presided over a large and distinguished company. The speakers were the Chairman, Mr. Maitland, Mr. Galloway, Mr. Walkley, and Canon Pemberton.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, in proposing the health of Mr. and Mrs. Fuller Maitland, said he desired to speak of the character of the duties which their distinguished friend had most ably discharged during the last twenty-two years. Criticism had been defined as the application in its most competent form of the true and best rules applicable to the particular art. There was no greater mistake than to think that the object of a critic ought to be to find out points which he could censure or blame. It had been truly said that the more beautiful the work the more fitted it was to be the subject of genuine criticism. One of the sides of the critic's work which involved difficulty was that in which he had to speak of an artistic performance, dealing with it as the artistic performance of an individual. He would, of course, when he could, encourage the young artist. He must, if he were just, call attention at times to errors and mistakes, all the more because his guidance might enable those very errors and mistakes to be cured and corrected. The critic must be absolutely honest; he must be neither benevolent nor adverse; he must give a just judgment without partiality or bias. He must possess very considerable qualifications in regard to the knowledge of the art which he purported to criticise; he must have ripe experience and knowledge of the history of the art of which he spoke; he must be acquainted with the various styles which from time to time were of necessity imitated by those composers or artists who were performing their productions before him, and therefore, although he himself might be as liable to error as other people, yet he did and must bring to bear upon the discharge of his duties that absolute freedom from bias which was the essential characteristic of every just Judge. The duties which a critic had to perform to the satisfaction of the public and of himself involved qualities of a very high order. They had invited their friend Mr. Fuller Maitland to that banquet because he was about to terminate his public connection with one of our greatest newspapers. He would not say that his friend of many years' standing had never made mistakes. His comments had not always commanded universal accord. He never knew a critic, any more than a Judge, who was always right, but he could honestly say that Mr. Fuller Maitland had brought to bear upon his work great knowledge, great impartiality, and a determination to give to the musical world the best that he possessed. He had never written a line prompted by malice or actuated by any ill-feeling.—(From The Times.)

MR. FULLER MAITLAND replied as follows:

Lord Alverstone, Ladies, and Gentlemen, I thank you with all my heart for the way in which you have responded to the toast; when I see this splendid gathering, and so many of those from whose creations or performances I have received such enormous pleasure in the past, I feel in a very difficult position, for I cannot claim the honour of being the senior critic of the London musical Press (I am very sorry that Mr. Shedlock, who I believe holds that position, is not here to-night). I feel that it is necessary to offer you some excuse for my retirement. I have no difference of opinion with my employers or my superior officers, for I have been treated by my dear editor and my friends the members of the staff, with the same unflinching kindness and toleration that they have extended to me for the last two-and-twenty years. I have not got tired of playing Canute or Mrs. Partington to the advancing tide of the new music, for I am not in the least afraid of getting my feet wet. I have still the enjoyment of good health, but the real reason—if you will promise not to tell anybody else—is that I lately witnessed a performance of 'Fanny's first play,' and I am convinced that in her second, Fanny will be certain to turn her attention to the musical critics as she has already done to my dramatic colleagues, and I feel that London journalism is no longer any place for me.

In the thirty years that have passed since I first wrote regularly for the London Press, there have been many important changes in music and in the condition of things musical. In the early eighties opera, except when Patti or Albani sang, was non-existent for the fashionable world, for Harris had not revived the taste for opera as a fashionable amusement, and the spasmodic efforts of Carl Rosa, fruitful as they were in an artistic sense, were not a remarkable financial success. The few of us who cared to improve our acquaintance with the classical symphonies were accustomed to resort week by week to the Crystal Palace, often at the terrific speed of twelve miles an hour, in what were called express trains, because they stopped at none of the intermediate stations, but between them all. But when we got there, how our enthusiasm for the best things were re-kindled week by week by dear Sir George Grove, and what a wonderful educational purpose the concerts served! Nowadays no one seems to care about the educational side of concerts, but then we were given a real insight into the number and character of the great Symphonies, in a way that was done in chamber music by the 'Pops.'—I beg your pardon, I should say the 'Popular Concerts.' And we needed a considerable deal of education in those days! I well remember, one day, when Madame Schumann was playing the softest part of Beethoven's 'Characteristic' Sonata, seeing two dear old ladies come into the unreserved balcony, which was packed as full as it could possibly hold, and saying in a loud voice, 'We want two of the best places!' I was unfortunately not present on a more famous occasion when a sudden cessation of the music enabled the whole audience to hear the remark, 'We always fry ours in lard!' There was once a special concert given in the middle of the week at the request of Joachim, for the sake of a performance of three posthumous Quartets of Beethoven, and a young man sitting near me said to his neighbour, 'I say, will it be posthumous next week too?' 'O yes,' she replied, 'awfully posthumous!' Those were great days for the students of Wagner's music, for in the year that I began to write regularly, Richter introduced us at Drury Lane to the 'Meistersinger' and 'Tristan,' and in the same year, the enterprise of Angelo Neumann gave us the first London performance of the whole of the trilogy at Her Majesty's Theatre. There, I think at the end of 'Götterdämmerung,' I overheard an old gentleman in the gallery say as he came out, 'Ah it's all very well now, but where will this music be in ten years time!' I have often wished to meet him since.

The great change that has come over music in the last thirty years has as the inevitable result of overstocking the profession, and the problem of how to succeed in the musical world is one of the most serious before us in the present day. In consideration of this I hope I may be forgiven if I offer some advice to the young performers who are trying to make a career, and to those who are doing all they can to befriended them. There is only one road to success, and the first, second and third steps along it are to deserve success. In my longish experience, I have not known a single instance of acknowledged and permanent failure that was not easy to account for as the result of some mental or physical infirmity, some fault of temper, some bad habit, like the inability to keep engagements, or to remember how many quavers there are in a bar of 6-8 time. In like manner, I have known no case of real and lasting success achieved without some merit at the back of it, though of course there are many kinds of artistic merit, and the standard of the music-hall performer is not that of the concert artist. Therefore, I would say to the young musician, 'Deserve success; fit yourself for it at every point, so far as in you lies; be more ready to recognise the good points in others than to fancy that they have obtained their success by illicit means. Above all, never pay for appearances, for, apart from the dishonesty implied in such a practice, people are sure to find it out, and you will be encouraged only by impecunious concert-givers and shunned by all whose good opinion is best worth having.'

To those who are kind enough to interest themselves in the career of young artists I would point out that the time when the student has completed his musical education is the hardest struggle of his life; it is then that help and counsel are most urgently needed. There are at present ten people who are ready to pay for the education of a promising young musician, for one who will befriend him after he 'comes out.'

Lastly, may I be allowed a few words of 'shop' to my fellow-critics? I feel proud to have been a member of the London musical Press for so long, for I think that no musical Press in the world holds anything like so high a position as that of London for integrity, independence, or literary and musical skill. But I sometimes wish there were a more general sense of responsibility among us. I am credibly informed (and I don't think that any secret is made about it) that some concerts are given in order to secure a number of 'good' notices from the critics. By 'good,' these concert-givers naturally mean something like a very thin slice of bread spread thick with butter, heaped up with jam and honey, and with a liberal sprinkling of sugar on the top. By a 'good' criticism I do not, of course, mean that sort of thing which defeats its own object, since there is sure to be someone present who knows how untrue it is. The value of an adverse criticism, faithfully and kindly expressed, can hardly be over-estimated, and many an artist looks back to an adverse criticism as the turning-point in his career, as having shown him where he erred, and pointed the way to better things. I would recommend the young critic to address himself mentally to the person he is criticising, and to write as if speaking in his presence with the honesty and gentleness of a doctor whose real opinion, not empty compliments, is sought for. I do not think we shall go far wrong if we keep in mind the personality of the individual we are criticising, and repress as far as may be that sense of humour which is certain to be generated in every true critic by the circumstances of his profession. Such a queer side of human nature is presented to the critic-day by day that I defy the most unhumorous person in the world to be a musical critic for a week without developing a sense of humour. Lastly, to all who are concerned in music, whether as performers, patrons, or critics, I would sum up these remarks in a sentence with which Joachim ended a speech on a famous occasion, 'Uphold the dignity of Art.'

MR. MAITLAND'S SUCCESSOR.

Mr. H. C. Colles has been appointed musical critic of The Times in place of Mr. Fuller Maitland, whose retirement is recorded above. Mr. Colles has for some years acted as junior critic for the great newspaper, and he has contributed many thoughtful and ably-written critical articles to our own columns. A few particulars of his career may be of interest. He was born on April 20, 1879; he studied at the Royal College of Music from 1895 until, in 1899, he gained the organ scholarship of Worcester College, Oxford. His degrees are those of B.A. (1903), Mus. Bac. (1904), and M.A. (1907). His critical work began in 1905, when he became musical correspondent to The Academy. In 1906 he was appointed as assistant critic to Mr. Fuller Maitland.

Dalle Antiche Norme e dalle Nuove considerazione sull' arte del canto. By Paolo Guetta.

[Ricordi & Co.]

The Italian schools but rarely send us singers whom we can hail as exponents of the famous art of the bel canto. But to an extent Italy is still the home of song, and the language and the music of a country and their history have a powerful influence on opinions and taste in matters of the voice and singing. Anything written thereon by an Italian maestro di canto of experience must at least excite great interest. The readers of Signor Guetta's little book will not be disappointed if they hope to gain from its study valuable information and instruction. It shows that there is yet a good deal left of the traditions of the old schools, and that it is bearing good fruit. The views of Signor Guetta are sound, and his counsels are sagacious. There is ample evidence in these hundred and odd pages that the author has thought deeply and persistently on his subject, that he bases his conclusions upon a large and varied experience and an extensive study of old and contemporary writers on the subject, and that he is an enthusiast in his work and his calling. He writes frankly, but he often crowds his ideas, and for this reason, and because his style is at times somewhat involved, his booklet is not easy reading. Although addressed to the pupil, it seems to be one for the teacher to digest.

To offer a few general remarks on a book discussing matters of physiology and psychology, musical practice and science, appears futile. For detailed discussion, ample space would be wanted. The author's principles and most of his practical deductions and propositions for teaching are thoroughly sound. The following are extracts from his conversazioni, freely translated in condensed form.

In olden times only the select few devoted themselves to the art of singing. To-day a whole crowd is singing in Italy after but poor study, a host of indifferent singers with voices small in volume and range, and weak in talent. Responsible for this state of things is the great demand for singers, arising out of the amelioration of social conditions among the people and the advance of science, which is proffered in popular form. The readers of the little manuals see a lucrative future before them. But practice, unfortunately, does not show the course so open and easy. Confusion and downfall follow.

Writing about the qualities and capacity a teacher should possess, Signor Guetta is in agreement with what Tosi wrote nearly two hundred years ago. He shows the evil results caused by the recklessness with which many singers pass from one master to another, and the disastrous consequences of the hurry with which they pursue their studies and enter into professional life without being sure of their voices or properly equipped as musicians. He scorns the idea of a born singer who has nothing to learn but his or her parts. The chapter on entrance examinations and voice trials is very instructive. The fatal influences of nervousness, previous teaching, or self-conceived ideas are exposed. In the greater number of cases the examination should be repeated.

Signor Guetta sketches his own method eloquently. It is founded upon experience and supported by scientific facts. The beauty of the voice is the outcome of the harmonious movements of the muscles which are engaged in producing it (of course we understand that favourable conditions of mind and body are presupposed). The will is the first indispensable force to direct the search for the way. Will is constancy. One must proceed slowly. The throat muscles which engender the sound, those of the pharynx, mouth and neck, and thorax, must be trained to preserve their elasticity. La voce per la voce; to obtain its greatest æsthetic perfection was the first principle of the old schools and must be the foremost for all time. In training we must proceed from those tones of a voice which are most spontaneously given, and do not require more trouble to produce than the speaking voice. These are the sympathetic tones. A fundamental precept was: A wide throat (gola larga). This ensures a natural opening of the mouth, normal position of tongue, a position of the larynx a little lower than during repose, &c. The movements which lead to an open throat necessitate no apparent or real force. A calm and regular respiration prevents restriction and hardness. Another precious precept of the old schools, unfortunately interpreted in various fantastic ways, is: The voice above the breath. The breath should not be felt to rise and reach the throat, in which the voice originates. When it is limited to the quantity necessary to feed the sound, the voice comes forth without the breath appearing to take part in its emission. To those who showed no defects respiration was not mentioned. Generally reference to the taking of breath was avoided. Very pertinently Signor Guetta draws attention to the fact that breath varies with every movement (exemplifying them) in any part of the body, and that the throat is capable of greatly varied expansion.

The chapter on registers makes entertaining and profitable reading. 'If to-day a new tribunal of Inquisition should be created, I believe a lecture on what has been written on registers would be among the tortures to be inflicted on the guilty.' The solution of this question, one of overcoming difficulties of mechanism, not of limitations of nature, will be found in utilising the observation that the character of a homogeneous, regular emission of a voice which is sonorous without exaggeration and finely developing, is not that of the so-called chest voice but of tones above it. As to details of this important principle of teaching, and a multitude of other questions, such as the choice and form of exercises, vocalisation, pronunciation and expression, and others, the reader must be referred to the book, which contains a wealth of valuable suggestions. Signor Guetta agrees with Mazzucato that agility is the only means to equalize a voice perfectly in its entire range, and wisely insists that there cannot be laid down hard and fast rules, but that a method must be adaptable and adapted to every type and character and to the physical individuality of every pupil. Anecdotes, personal reminiscences, and descriptions of special cases are a feature of the little book, which is full of humour and offers multum in parvo.

The oldest music room in Europe. By Dr. J. H. Mee.

[John Lane.]

It is to Oxford residents and Oxford men that 'The oldest music room in Europe' will primarily appeal: but so well has Dr. Mee brought men and manners, as well as facts, before us, that a far wider circle will read his book with pleasure.

Opened in July, 1748, with a performance of 'Esther,' at which Handel himself may have been present, the Music Room at Oxford was for over forty years the scene of an almost unbroken series of weekly concerts supplied by a small permanent band, assisted by vocal and instrumental performers of the highest excellence.

After 1789, the weekly concerts were for some years held only intermittently, the ultimate lack of support being, in Dr. Mee's opinion, largely due to the effects of the Oxford Movement; the Music Room fell gradually into disuse till, for some forty years before it became, in 1901, the home of the University Musical Union, it served only as a rehearsal-room for the various musical Societies of the town.

In 1808 the choir employed in oratorio performances was 'only about the size of a large cathedral choir,' namely 22 voices, all good ones—probably forming a perfect balance with the band of 19 instrumentalists, it being remembered that the organ is to be reckoned with the choir. In this particular modern conductors might take a hint from their predecessors of a hundred years ago. As instances of the difference of taste at that time, it was thought quite appropriate to sing a comic song between the 1st and 2nd acts of 'Esther'! While in a programme for a miscellaneous concert the following rather striking juxtaposition of words occurs:

Song: Stay, silver moon, nor hasten down the skies,
I seek the bower where lovely Chloe lies.

Chorus: And the glory of the Lord shall be revealed.

The Oxford Music Room is rich in associations: Dr. William Hayes, Dr. Philip Hayes, and Dr. Crotch successively conducted the concerts; and Haydn, Hummel, Salomon, Cramer, Abel, Sestini, Mrs. Billington, Mara, Catalani, Brahms, and Clara Novello are only a few of the great names connected with the performances there.

Dr. Mee's researches have been made with no stint of care or labour, and so thoroughly has he done his task that his book would seem to cover the whole field of Oxford music in the period with which he deals, while the illustrations are excellent, and the catalogue which he gives of the library of the Musical Society will be of real value to musico-antiquaries. His pleasant style and evident enthusiasm have made the work no mere catalogue of dry facts, but a study of bygone times which will be read with unflagging interest.

Modern Organ Building. By W. and T. Lewis.

[William Reeves.]

The preface to this really admirable work explains the purpose for which it was compiled. Pneumatic and electro-pneumatic organs only are dealt with, the authors rightly considering that the tracker organ has already an extensive literature.

The contents comprise seven chapters, in which the subjects of up-to-date examples of organ parts, building-frame, bellows, blowing, action, pipes and their timbre, voicing and tuning, are explained in detail.

A feature of the book is the clearness of the illustrations, which are so well proportioned that the most unmechanical person (as alas! too many organists are) can surely understand them. Though we do not expect every organist to be an organ-builder, we think that he should know enough to enable him to set right some minor defect to which the finest work is at times liable.

To the candidate for the R.C.O. examinations, Messrs. Lewis have rendered a great service, which we hope will be well appreciated. The chapter on tuning will repay careful study, and should prove most useful to the 'thorough' organist. We welcome the book cordially, and with every confidence recommend it.

Obituary.

The death of JOSEPH BENNETT, which occurred on June 12, at Berkeley, where he was born in 1831, brings a sense of personal loss to musicians of the older generation throughout the kingdom. Those of the younger generation who, owing to his retirement in 1906, have seen little or nothing of his full activities, will nevertheless know his reputation as a great master of the art of musical criticism. The high qualities of his literary style and the justness, balance and kindness of his critical attitude were the virtues for which he was famed, and need not again be elaborated. His life and works were described in our own columns as recently as last December, when a portrait was also given. His death removes an interesting personality, and a link with one of the most interesting periods of musical history.

We regret also to have to report the following deaths:

Mrs. FANNY GREEN, on May 3, one of the most notable lady organists of her time and a brilliant pianist. Born in 1842, Mrs. Green, then Fanny Roe, was appointed organist of St. James's, Hampstead Road, at the age of fourteen. Two years later she became organist at St. Katharine's Royal Collegiate Church, Regent's Park, a post which she held for nearly forty years, till her retirement in 1898.

JOHAN SEVERIN SVENDSEN, the composer of the famous Romance for violin and pianoforte, at Copenhagen, on June 15. Born in 1840, he was trained as a violinist until a stroke of paralysis interrupted his career as a performer and confined his future musical activities to composition. His works, which are not numerous, include two Symphonies, the 'Carnaval à Paris,' and Chamber music. They often reach and sustain a higher level of thought than the 'Romance,' but his fame rests practically upon that piece alone.

Mlle. SEDLAZEK, whose name was familiar to opera-lovers in the early sixties, when she was much associated with Mario, Grisi, and other leading favourites. She had a contralto voice of great beauty.

TOUR OF THE MANCHESTER ORPHEUS GLEE SOCIETY.

The Whitsuntide tour in the Rhineland provinces of the Manchester Orpheus Glee Society was one long series of triumphs, socially and musically: Frankfurt and Wiesbaden set the pace in hospitality and appreciation, and Homburg, Bad Nauheim, and Cologne almost vied with each other in the warmth of welcome extended to the Lancashire visitors. Civic authorities, no less than private citizens and musical associations, considered no sacrifice of time or convenience too great in order to secure the complete comfort of their guests. Rarely can such spontaneous enthusiasm amongst all classes of the community have been evoked by the visit of a body of singers. The districts visited are the home of male-voice singing—practised here to an extent unknown even in Wales, often than not in pursuance of social intercourse.

In the Wiesbaden Kurhaus, hot night though it was, the concert hall was practically full for the Gleemen's first concert; their reception proved that they sang their way into the affections of the Whit-Sunday night's audience. At Homburg the choir co-operated with the Kurhaus orchestra, Herr Schilling-Ziemssen of the Frankfurt opera conducting on this occasion.

In Frankfurt the stately Kaiserhall of the Römer (Guildhall would be our nearest equivalent) was the scene of a fraternal gathering, the Oberbürgermeister Dr. Adickes (a warm supporter of Anglo-German friendship) having invited the members of the best male-voice choir in that city, the Frankfurt teachers, to meet Mr. Nesbitt's men. The conversation was in the medium known to both, viz., songs. On that last evening, in the most beautiful and largest of Frankfurt's pleasure grounds—the Palm Garten—Mr. Nesbitt received from the Frankfurt Choral Union a huge laurel wreath. Next morning the Frankfurter Zeitung said: 'The voices throughout were very flexible, admirably rendering fine shades and delicate gradations of tone, but by no means wanting in strength and decision. The highest point of efficiency was reached in Beale's "Come, let us join the roundelay," with its alternate dance rhythm and broad, choral effects. Of almost the same high standard was the rendering of the "Dance of Gnomes," by the American, MacDowell, an original and characteristic piece, enthusiastically encored. The Elgar Greek Anthology lyrics were excellently interpreted. At the conclusion of the concert great applause broke out, and the English choir acknowledged it by singing the "Schlummerliedchen" of Brahms in German. No choir of German birth could have sung it with greater delicacy.'

After Frankfurt came Cologne, where the Orpheus men were entertained by the Männergesangsverein at its old club-house. Later they were the guests of the Cologne Corporation, in the historic Gürzenich Hall. The Cologne Choir and about a hundred of her leading citizens were present. Both choirs sang before and after dinner (Manchester after). When the Orpheus singers had finished two verses of Brahms's 'Wiegenlied,' Mr. Nesbitt quietly turned to the company and said 'Alle zusammen,' and straightway from five hundred men the strains of the last stanza of this exquisite lullaby floated softly through the hall—that was the emotional climax of the tour. From here was transmitted to the Kaiser an expression of gratitude for the kindly welcome accorded. The following afternoon the Cologne Choir Committee gave a farewell lunch at the Dom Hotel.

Mr. Nesbitt's impressions were: 'The wonderful power and brilliance of tone of the German male-voice choirs are their most striking feature. In this their quality surpasses any that we have heard in our own country or in Wales. It may be due to the remarkable physique of the members of the German choirs by comparison with that of our British choirs. But in refinement of expression and poetic interpretation the best English choirs are quite equal to them. This comment was very frequently made by our German friends, who so closely study and foster the German folk-songs. We have been welcomed everywhere with a warmth of heart exceeding our most sanguine hopes, and to every member of the Choir it will be an everlasting remembrance.'

As coming from a German source the following quotation from a notice of the Choir's performance at Cologne in the Kölnische Zeitung is interesting: 'The Choir,' says the Zeitung, 'showed the excellent qualities to which they have attained. Their voices are on the whole rather softer in quality than those of the German singers. The tenors have command of an excellent falsetto. They display a rare elasticity and precision, overcoming technical difficulties. They lay especial stress on the meaning and character of the compositions, and in this respect were nowise inferior in Hegar's "Phantom Host" to the German prize renderings. The "Dance of Gnomes" was admirably given with the macabre quality and the humour proper to the piece.'

Captain Schlagintweit, the German Consul in Manchester, accompanied the party throughout, his tireless energy and forethought being potent factors in the success of the tour.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

'LA FANCIULLA DEL WEST.'

The chief event of the operatic month has been the production at Covent Garden of Signor Puccini's latest opera, 'La Fanciulla del West.' For once Signor Puccini departed from his usual custom, and gave the initial hearing of his opera to a country other than his own. This work was first performed in America last autumn, the second country to witness it being England. The reason for the choice of America for the first production is not far to seek. The story is American. It deals with the period of history in that enterprising country when men, manners, customs and feelings were generally primitive. The period is the Fifties, when gold had just been discovered in California. The social conditions of that time have been revealed to us in their varied aspect by Bret Harte. In this instance their delineator is Mr. David Belasco, on whose drama the operatic libretto by Signori Guelfo Civinini and Carlo Zangarini has been based. In itself the tale is intensely dramatic. Its central figure is Minnie, whose business is primarily to fulfil the function of maid at the 'Polka' tavern—a real home for the boys, as it is termed. She also looks after their spiritual welfare by instructing them in elementary theology and by reading them chapters from the Bible. Her influence generally is good. The simple, honest miners are harassed by a gang of robbers whose head is Ramarez, known as Dick Johnson. He comes to the 'Polka,' introducing himself in a manner that at once attracts attention, since he asks for water with his whisky. His real aim is to appropriate the miners' gold left in charge of Minnie, while the whole camp is after Ramarez on a false scent. He is fascinated by Minnie's goodness, calls her an angel, and forgets to rob the till. Minnie, who has just reminded the Sheriff of his inattentiveness, is so taken by the gallant robber that she invites him to come to her cottage. He accepts the invitation, and is received by Minnie in her best dress. A storm arises that is too violent to permit of Johnson's leaving, although it does not prevent a search party headed by the Sheriff from following Johnson's tracks to Minnie's dwelling. Minnie hides her accepted lover. The searchers open her eyes as to his real character, and when they have left Minnie reproaches him. He defends himself on the ground that from the day he was born 'he was reared on stolen money.' The moral nature of Minnie compels her to dismiss him, and he goes, only to be shot on her doorstep by the Sheriff. Again Minnie hides him, and denies his existence when the Sheriff returns. But the blood from Johnson's wounds drips on to the Sheriff's hand from the attic, and the much-sought road agent is captured. Minnie, ever resourceful, induces the Sheriff to gamble with her as to which of them shall take possession of Johnson. Minnie cheats, and wins, and a highly melodramatic scene ends. The hunt for Johnson is continued in the last Act, and there is a most beautiful scene at the foot of the Cloudy Mountains in the early morning. Johnson is captured, and is about to be hanged, when Minnie pleads with her old friends for her true lover's life. More than half the camp is in love with her, so she has no difficulty in winning pardon for the robber, with whom she strolls off as the curtain falls. Thus the story is melodramatic; and as far as the music is concerned it proves too melodramatic. Contrary to the case of 'Madame Butterfly,' a musical setting does not increase the dramatic force of the plot, and though Signor Puccini has provided a score that includes a good deal that has already been accepted as dramatic, the result is not very convincing. Certain features stand out. There is attractive use of one or two American airs; the scenes between Johnson and Minnie are devised with complete command of modern operatic technique as originated by Puccini; there is immense intensity in the game of cards for a living stake; and Johnson's plea to his captors that Minnie shall not be told of his ungentlemanly end is highly-strung music. But the new ideas are delayed until too late in the opera, and since the earlier portions for the most part comprise devices with which Signor Puccini has already made us familiar, his latest score does not advance matters very much. The performance is remarkably good. Mile. Destin makes an excellent Minnie, and never fails to meet the strenuous claims of the music. Two representatives of Johnson have appeared in the course of the month, and these—Signor Bassi, the original, and Mr. Riccardo Martin, his successor—have done extremely well. Mr. Gilly has established his position as a modern operatic artist of the first water by his impersonation and splendid singing as the Sheriff, and the cast, which abounds in small parts, has been given with notable completeness. Signor Campanini conducted the production, at which the composer was present, and brought out the full value of the rather over-loaded score.

The twenty-third annual festival of the Nonconformist Choir Union has been arranged to take place at the Crystal Palace on July 1.

THE LONDON MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

Only the first three concerts of this festival could be dealt with in last month's issue. The fourth, on May 23, was that at which, according to the original arrangement, Strauss would have been the conductor. His absence destroyed the purpose for which the Mozart numbers were included in the programme, for Strauss is a noted Mozart-lover and Mozart-conductor, and the Symphony in G minor and the Pianoforte concerto in D minor (soloist, Mr. Harold Bauer) were chosen to illustrate his tastes and abilities in this direction. However, the circumstances enabled Sir Henry Wood to conduct 'Also sprach Zarathustra' with the Queen's Hall Orchestra for the first time, and for this there was reason to be thankful, for the performance was one of extraordinary beauty, strength, clarity and technical brilliance. Its clarity only relapsed for a moment in the opening of the Fugue. The remainder of the programme consisted of Strauss's early and exuberant 'Burleske' for pianoforte and orchestra, dashing played by Mr. Bauer; the 'Dance of the Seven Veils' from 'Salome,' and the closing scene from the same opera. In this, Madame Aino Ackte repeated and, in the effect on the listener, surpassed, her stage triumphs, for the scene contains little action and that little is repulsive. The reading of the orchestral part was the most lucid that had been heard in London, and the significance of the music was thereby heightened.

The performance of Bach's B minor Mass given on May 24 was in essentials a repetition of that given by the same choir under the same conductor during the recent Sheffield Festival, and described in our last issue. Sir Henry Wood's self-evolved method of instructing the choir in the treatment of every nuance of phrasing, tone-gradation, and vocal delivery again led to results of surprising virtuosity and emotionalism, and of arresting significance, which held the attention and admiration even at those moments when one was most conscious that the conductor was expressing his own personality rather than the composer's. The same impression was created by the choral singing on the following day, when the 'St. Matthew' Passion was performed and the choral body was that of the Leeds Festival. If any had tears to shed at the over-rendering of Bach, they had reason to shed them now, for Sir Henry Wood let no opportunity slip by of adapting the choral delivery and expression to the momentary suggestion of the words. The chorales were treated in the style of the part-song, and some were entrusted to a solo-quartet (the Sheffield Festival quartet). It was magnificently done, but the method was not calculated to appeal to everyone as appropriate. But as in the case of the Mass, the technical carrying-out of these interpretative devices was sufficient to atone for any dissatisfaction. Both choirs performed their technical feats with as little apparent concern as if they were a part of every-day life. Taken in conjunction with the singing of the Huddersfield Choir at the International Congress in the following week, they confirmed in unmistakable fashion the supremacy of Yorkshire choirs among the larger choral bodies.

The soloists in the Mass were Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Ellen Beck, Miss Edna Thornton, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Robert Radford. Those in the Passion were Mr. Gervase Elwes (whose interpretation of the Narrator's part was of outstanding excellence), Miss Nicholls, Miss Thornton, Mr. Herbert Brown (as Jesus), and Mr. Radford.

The directors of the Festival are more to be congratulated upon the artistic than upon the financial results. The lavish scale of the performances, to say nothing of the expenses of bringing the three choirs to London, necessitated a high scale of charges. The attendance showed, however, that however great the attraction offered, a five-shilling gallery, with other seats in proportion, closes more purses than it opens.

PURCELL'S 'FAIRY QUEEN.'

One of the most interesting events of the month was the performance of Purcell's 'Fairy Queen,' given at the Royal Victoria Hall, on June 10, by the music students of Morley College. The work has had a remarkable history, inasmuch as the score was lost for over 200 years, from 1695 until its recent discovery in the library of the Royal Academy of Music. It has now been published by the Purcell Society, with considerable assistance from the Morley College students in the copying of the parts.

The music is incidental to 'A Midsummer night's Dream,' but is mainly concerned with additional lyrics and episodes by some unnamed author. For instance, the first Act contains a scene in which a drunken poet is teased and tickled by fairies into a confession of his crimes; the musical setting is full of quips and cranks cleverly expressed in contrapuntal terms. The second Act closes with a 'night-scene' in which four characters, Light, Mystery, Secrecy and Sleep sing appropriate songs to the slumbering Titania. Immediately before this scene there is a solo and chorus, 'Sing, sing, while we trip it,' that is the daintiest number in the work. The leading features of all this music are its freedom from conventional design and a kind of irresponsibility and freshness that are none the less welcome because they are expected. There is none of the faded 17th century about it. Some genuine dignity is introduced by such numbers as 'The plaint,' a solo with violin obbligato constructed on a ground bass, and the majority of the choruses, especially 'Hail, great Parent of us all.' The 'Symphony' which introduces the fourth Act contains some ideas and working-out of great value. Throughout the performance the interest was constantly enlivened by that attractiveness of invention and boldness of thought with which Purcell's other works have made us familiar.

For the purpose of this performance some excisions were made, the fifth Act being omitted except for some representative numbers that were distributed among the other Acts. Dr. R. Vaughan Williams introduced each section with a short explanation of its plot and a few remarks upon the music. The solo parts were taken by Misses Helen Greig, Alice Haselgrove and Beatrice Payne, Messrs. Percival Poole, Ernest Raggett, and Ernest Hoare. The choir and orchestra did their work artistically, under the careful and able direction of Mr. Gustav von Holst.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

This organization has been more than usually active during the present season, as the usual series of Monday evening concerts has been supplemented on several occasions. M. Mlynarski conducted a special concert given on May 26, with the purpose of introducing his Symphony 'Polonia,' and a Symphony by the young Russian composer, M. Wischnegradsky. The latter was the more polished, but it was the less individual utterance. 'Polonia' represents Poland, which country M. Mlynarski has depicted in musical terms of striking vigour and expressiveness.

Two extra concerts were given on June 8 and June 15, with the purpose of providing further hearings of Sir Edward Elgar's second Symphony. The project seemed to have taken the public by surprise, since there was but a meagre attendance on the first of these occasions, but at the second the audience was much larger. Further acquaintance with the Symphony increases one's sense of the depth of thought underlying its exuberance, and of the difficulty of attempting to 'place' it with reference to its predecessor. Some disagreement has been expressed with the composer's own opinion that the second Symphony is on a totally different psychological plane from that of the first Symphony, and represents a more serene mood. It is unquestionable, however, that the themes, even in the slow movement, speak of a lighter heart and more tranquil emotions, and that the moments of greatest stress or fervour are free from the inward conflict of the other work.

The programme on June 8 included Brahms's Variations on a theme by Haydn, Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings, and Berlioz's 'Corsair' Overture. That given on June 15 included the Bach 'Brandenburg' Concerto in G, and Beethoven's 'Coriolan' Overture. Miss Dorothy Lindley was prevented by indisposition from being present to play Saint-Saëns's G minor Pianoforte concerto. Both concerts were conducted by Sir Edward Elgar, whose interpretations of all the music were full of interest and individuality.

The last of the subscription concerts took place on June 12, under the direction of Herr Nikisch. The conditions were ideal for the performance of the love-duet from 'Tristan,' and the surging, throbbing passion of the orchestral part was played with extraordinary intensity of feeling. The solo vocalists were Miss Susan Strong and Mr. Walter Hyde.

Miss Eleanor Spencer played Beethoven's third Pianoforte concerto, and the orchestra was heard alone in the 'Rienzi' Overture and in Mr. Holbrooke's symphonic-poem, 'Dylan.'

THE VIOLA.

A lecture on the Viola—a topic that has received growing attention recently—was given at Æolian Hall on June 9 by the authority best qualified to do so, Mr. Lionel Tertis. He referred to the low estimation in which the instrument was held formerly, and traced its increasing employment, usefulness, and dignity down to the present day. Its treatment in the hands of modern composers was illustrated by the following programme:

Short piece for six violas .. .. .	B. J. Dale.
'Fairland,' a nocturne for viola, oboe d'amore, and pianoforte .. .. .	Holbrooke.
Romantic Poem for viola, harp, and organ .. .. .	York Bowen.
Fantasia for viola and pianoforte .. .. .	Cyril Scott.
Song with viola obbligato, 'At the midhour of night' .. .. .	York Bowen.

All these works were performed for the first time, and the best general description to give is that they were characteristic and worthy of their composers, a description which carries much praise. The artists who took part in their presentation were Miss Sylvia Dalton (vocalist), Miss Miriam Timothy (harpist), Miss Dorothy Jones, Miss Phyllis Mitchell, Mr. Eric Coates, Mr. Raymond Jeremy, Mr. J. T. Lockyer, and Mr. Lionel Tertis (viola), Mr. Henri de Busscher (oboe d'amore), Mrs. Herbert Withers, Messrs. Dale, Scott, and Bowen (pianists).

MR. WILHELM GANZ'S BENEFIT.

One of the most brilliant affairs of the season was the benefit matinée given to Mr. Wilhelm Ganz at the Albert Hall, on June 1. It drew together a constellation of unusual magnificence, in which the brightest star was Adelina Patti. Her singing of Mozart's 'Voi che sapete' and Lotti's 'Pur dicesti' had all the entrancing perfection of vocalisation, arresting individuality, and engaging expression that gave and still give her a position of pre-eminence among the world's singers. It was pleasing to see Madame Tetravzini, who presented a bouquet, give impulsive expression to her admiration by a warm embrace. Madame Patti's further contributions were Tosti's 'Serenata,' and her old favourite, 'Home, sweet home!' Her accompaniments were played by her nephew, Mr. Alfredo Barili. The other artists who gave their services were Madame Ackté, Miss Maggie Teyte, Miss Ellen Terry, Miss Cecilia Loftus, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Gregory Hast, Mr. Robert Radford, Mr. Charles Ganz, Mr. Jean Gérardy, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. George Alexander, and Mr. Henry Ainley. A short speech of thanks to Madame Patti was made by Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree.

MR. ROZE'S 'JOAN OF ARC.'

The concert performance of an opera is at best a poor substitute for a stage presentation, but in the case of the majority of British operas it is at present the only way to get a hearing. Recognizing the fact, Mr. Raymond Roze gave a number of extracts from his opera, 'Joan of Arc' in concert form at Queen's Hall, on May 24, with the capable assistance of Miss Maggie Teyte, Miss Marta Wittkowska, Mr. Enrico Tiberio, and Mr. Henry Rabke, the Edward Mason and Westminster Cathedral Choirs and the London Symphony Orchestra. The best features of the work were its fluent melodiousness and effective laying out; in style and manner it varied pleasantly between Wagner and Italy without achieving the depth and strength of the former. It was all, however, attractive music. The composer conducted with considerable ability.

MR. BEECHAM'S 'DELIUS' CONCERT.

The Delius Concert given at Queen's Hall served both to introduce a new work by that composer, and to remind us of the existence of Mr. Beecham and his Symphony Orchestra. The new work was a cycle of 'Songs of Sunset' to poems by Ernest Dowson, expressing the mutually reasoned despair of two lovers on the eve of a separation. The best feature of the music was the intensity and dignity of its pathos. It perhaps falls short of Mr. Delius's best work in inventiveness, but his characteristic harmonies and coloration are employed with abundance, and proportionate effect. The cycle is laid out for soprano (Madame Julia Culp), baritone (Mr. Thorpe Bates), choir (the Edward Mason), and orchestra. The remainder of the programme consisted of 'Appalachia,' 'Paris' and the 'Dance Rhapsody.' Mr. Beecham conducted with all the ability and individuality of method with which he made us familiar last year.

THE FESTIVAL OF EMPIRE.

The weekly Empire concerts have continued to uphold the high musical standard that marked the opening of the Festival. On May 30, the label was 'Canadian,' and Sir Alexander Mackenzie's 'Canadian Rhapsody' was given a welcome revival. Madame Albani and Miss Edith Miller represented the talent of the Dominion. On the following Tuesday an English programme of familiar works was given by English artists. An Australian scheme was adopted for the concert of June 13; Mr. Marshall Hall's Symphony in E flat was the chief work brought forward and, in the absence of Madame Melba, the artists were Miss Esta d'Argo, Mr. Peter Dawson, and Mr. Percy Grainger. On each occasion the orchestra was that of the Queen's Hall, which was directed by Sir Henry Wood, except when composers took charge of their own works. The first of the County Choir concerts took place on June 17, when a body of 2,000 singers from Lancashire was brought together on the Handel Orchestra, and sang under the direction of Mr. Granville Humphreys. The choral programme included Wilbye's madrigal, 'Adieu, sweet Amarillis,' Bantock's 'Emeric's lament for Cuchulain,' and Sullivan's 'The Beleaguered.' Songs were given by Mr. Andrew Sharpley (tenor) and organ solos by Miss Margaret Furness.

SUNDAY SCHOOL FESTIVALS.

Two organizations connected with the Sunday School movement have held their annual Festival at the Crystal Palace, and in each case the choirs attained the regulation estimate of 5,000 voices. On June 10 the Church Sunday School Choir held its thirty-first Festival, under the direction of Mr. W. Schofield. On June 14, the London Sunday School Choir held its thirty-ninth annual Festival; the two choirs, junior and senior, were conducted by Mr. J. Wellard Matthews and Mr. William Whiteman respectively. Each of these Festivals included a competitive section. They are more fully described in the School Music Review for July.

London Concerts.

THE PATRON'S FUND.

For their orchestral concert at Queen's Hall, on June 14, the executive of the Patron's Fund chose the plan of repeating a selection of the best works that had been produced at previous concerts. It is understood that the scheme of repetition is to be continued at some future concerts. The programme would seem to have been chosen to contradict the theory that British composers are prone to hypochondria. It consisted of Mr. York Bowen's Concert overture in G minor, Mr. G. von Holst's 'Scènes de Ballet,' Mr. George Dyson's 'Siena,' Mr. Montague Phillips's Symphonic Scherzo, and songs by Mr. Frank Bridge and Mr. Balfour Gardiner. The vocalists were Mr. Jamieson Dodds and Mr. Frederic Austin, and the conducting was done by Sir Charles Stanford and several of the composers. The executants were the London Symphony Orchestra.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAS.

The Westminster Orchestral Society, which Mr. Lennox Clayton instructs and conducts with such creditable results, played Brahms's second Symphony, Beethoven's 'Eroica,' and the B minor Violin concerto of Saint-Saëns (soloist, Miss Dorothy Bridson), at Caxton Hall on May 22.

The interesting features of the concert given by the Woltmann Orchestra, at Bechstein Hall, on May 26, were a picturesque Suite for pianoforte and strings by Ole Olsen, and the extreme youth of the pianist, Miss Evangeline Livens, who played cleverly.

Under Mr. Oswald Laston's direction, the Croydon District Orchestral Society took part in a concert of British compositions at Queen's (small) Hall on May 27. Their chief number was Mr. Ernest Austin's clever set of Variations on the 'Vicar of Bray.' Mr. Laston's West London Choir assisted.

The students' orchestra at the Royal College of Music made their most ambitious excursion into modern music on June 8, when they performed Rachmaninoff's second Symphony in E flat, under the direction of Sir Charles Stanford. Their playing was exceedingly efficient, and was equal to the occasion. The soloist of the concert was Miss Maud Bell (violinello).

The Bechstein Hall Orchestra resumed its activity for the purposes of a concert given on May 26, under the direction of Mr. Theodore Stier. The novelties of the programme were the Overture to 'The secret of Susan,' by Signor Wolff-Ferrari, and a suite for strings, 'Goldoniiani,' by Signor Bossi. Herr Hans Bottermund played D'Albert's Violoncello concerto.

Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony was the chief work performed by the Royal Engineers' Orchestra under Bandmaster Neville Flux at Queen's Hall on May 31. Other numbers were Liszt's second Rhapsody and Goldmark's 'Sakuntala' Overture. The playing of the orchestra, which has always been at a high standard, showed further progress in artistic capacity.

The recital given by Herr Gustav Havemann at Queen's Hall on June 6 had the double distinction of introducing to England a violinist of the front rank, and a 'Concertstück' for violin and orchestra, in two movements, recently composed by Max Bruch. The new work is worthy of the hand that wrote the popular G minor Concerto, and should make an additional appeal to English-speaking musicians in that the first movement is based upon 'The little red lark.' The interpretation given by Herr Havemann (who is a Joachim pupil) was one of outstanding excellence in every respect. The accompaniment was supplied by the New Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Lennox Clayton. The violinist was also heard in a new, Chaconne by Max Reger.

At a meeting of the Incorporated Society of Musicians held in the Doré Gallery on June 10, many British compositions were heard and many of the composers contributed a share of their performance at the pianoforte. Mr. Lionel Tertis played Fantasias for viola by Mr. B. J. Dale and Mr. Cyril Scott; Mr. John Saunders and Miss Jenny Hyman introduced a new 'Lyric sonata' for violin and pianoforte by Mr. Orlando Morgan; Mr. W. Westenholme played his own pianoforte pieces and improvised a Fugue; and the remainder of the programme, in which Miss Edith Clegg and Miss Alice Hare (vocalists), Mr. Fellowes (violin) and Mr. Hambleton (violinello) took part, consisted of works by Mr. Hubert Bath, Miss Prescott, Dr. Hazelhurst, Mr. Landon Ronald and Mr. Harry Keyser.

Mr. William Carter gave a 'Grand Patriotic Festival' at the Albert Hall on June 10, and did his best to draw a large gathering by the attractiveness of the fare provided. The artists taking part were Miss Alys Bateman, Miss Alice Lakin, Miss Marta Cunningham, Miss Grace Kenza, Mr. Charles Saunders, Mr. Lane Wilson, and Mr. Frederic Ranalow. Mr. Carter's choir and the Band of the Scots Guards assisted.

The Endowment Fund Concert given by the Queen's Hall Orchestra on June 17 did not draw a large audience, but it was a notable artistic success. It included a repetition of the fine reading of Strauss's 'Also sprach Zarathustra,' given at the London Festival, and a second performance of Mr. Granville Bantock's 'Dante and Beatrice.' The soloist of the occasion was Madame Lillian Blauvelt.

The gaiety of London has been heightened by the presence in our midst of Yvette Guilbert. She appeared at Bechstein Hall on May 22, May 29, June 8 and June 13, and amazed her hearers with her versatility while charming them with her personality. She drew her first programme from the Troubadour songs of the 13th century, and repeated it, by general request, at the second recital. At the third she impersonated 'fifteen types of women' with remarkable fidelity; and at the fourth she gave a programme of French and English folk-songs.

Mr. George Mackern gave an interesting Brahms concert at Æolian Hall on May 22. His own contribution included the pianoforte parts of the D minor Violin sonata, in which Miss Ruth Howell was the violinist, and of the F minor Quintet, Op. 34. A ladies' choir sang the four Trios, Op. 17, with harp and horn accompaniment.

Spanish music supplied the programme of Mr. Franz Liebig's concert at Æolian Hall on May 24. The modern School was favourably represented by the works of Señor de Falla and Señor Turina, who were given chief prominence. There were also examples by Albeniz, Olmeda, Granados, Morera, and Pedrell. The vocal numbers were given by Mlle. Berchut, and the pianoforte solos by Mr. Liebig.

Two concerts have been given by Madame Melba on the eve of her departure for a tour in Australia. On May 27, she gave a 'Coronation' concert at the Albert Hall, and sang a number of operatic excerpts to accompaniment supplied by the New Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Landon Ronald. Her actual farewell concert, which took place before an enormous audience at the same hall on June 11, had a similar programme, to which Herr Backhaus and Signor Carasa made additions.

Miss Fanny Davies and Señor Casals gave a further concert, assisted by Mr. Campbell McInnes, at Æolian Hall, on May 27. Miss Davies played the Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue of Bach, and assisted Señor Casals in the performance of Brahms's F major Violoncello sonata. Mr. McInnes sang Bach's cantata, 'Ich habe genug,' to which Mr. de Buscher supplied the oboe obbligato.

Messrs. Gerardy and Godowsky performed all Beethoven's Sonatas for violoncello and pianoforte at Bechstein Hall on May 27, and maintained the artistic perfection of their playing from beginning to end.

Le Cercle Musical de Paris gave a concert at Æolian Hall on May 29, with the assistance of M. Firmin Touche, Mr. Harold Bauer, and Miss Maggie Teyte. The item of chief interest was a Violin sonata by Mr. Charles Domergue that had not before been played in London.

The pupils of Mr. Orlando Morgan, who gave a concert at the Guildhall School of Music on June 8, brought forward some student-compositions among which an organ Fantasia by Mr. Gordon Burgess, played by the composer, was the most individual and praiseworthy. Other works presented were a Violin sonata by Mr. W. E. Lawrence, and songs by Miss Agnes Bedford and Miss Winifred Nash.

Miss Leila Doubleday, a young Australian violinist, made her first appearance in England at Queen's Hall on June 9, and played with sweet tone, highly refined expression and promising skill in concertos by Bruch (G minor) and Mendelssohn. The New Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Landon Ronald, assisted.

A Pianoforte quartet in C, Op. 14, by Heer Leander Schlegel, and the Trio by the youthful Korngold, were played by Mr. John Saunders, Mr. H. Krause, M. Jacques Renard, and Mr. Richard Epstein, at the concert given by Mr. Epstein at Steinway Hall on June 13.

One is prone to consider each successive musical prodigy more wonderful than the last, but there can be no doubt as to the exceptional gifts of Miss Susanne von Morvay, a Hungarian pianist of sixteen. They were exhibited at Æolian Hall on June 17 in a programme of which Liszt's B minor Sonata was the most exacting number.

Madame Clara Butt was in fine voice when she and Mr. Kennerley Rumford gave a farewell all-British concert at the Albert Hall on June 17. Her chief contribution was Elgar's 'The Kingsway.' That of Mr. Rumford was a new song, 'To the King,' by Mr. Hamilton Hartly. The other artists were Miss Eileen Castles and Mr. Ben Davies.

By giving a joint recital at the Albert Hall on Sunday, June 18, Messrs. Kubelik and Pachmann attracted a vast concourse of admirers, whom they sent away satisfied. The virtuosi were heard together in Beethoven's F major Sonata.

 Miss Beatrice Harrison, Queen's Hall, June 16.—Concerto in B minor, Doordik (with the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under Sir Henry Wood).

A very successful concert held at the Birkbeck College, under the direction of Mr. Richard H. Walthew, brought to a conclusion the sixth session of the University of London Musical Society. The first part of the programme included a number of glees, madrigals and part-songs, which were sung unaccompanied by the choral section. The second part consisted of Handel's 'Acis and Galatea,' in which Miss Fanny Wood was very successful as Galatea. The parts of Acis and Damon were undertaken by Mr. Alfred Steed and Mr. George Hows, and Mr. Bevington-Ross gave great pleasure by his presentation of Polyphemus. In addition to the choral numbers, vocal solos were given by Miss Wood and pianoforte solos by Madame Fischer Sobell.

Sir Frederick Bridge's 'The Song of the English' was the chief number in the programme of a 'Coronation Concert' given by the St. Margaret's Musical Society at the Royal Horticultural Hall on May 26, under the direction of the Rev. Jocelyn Perkins. Other works performed were Elgar's 'Coronation Ode' and Stanford's 'The Revenge.' The choir carried out their duties with an efficiency that testified to the carefulness and skill of their training. The soloists were Miss Viola Salvin, Miss Ethel Matthews, Mr. Louis Godfrey, and Mr. Dan Price.

An interesting concert was given in the fine hall of the Northern Polytechnic, Holloway, on May 31, by Mr. Munro Davison's Choral Society. Beethoven's Mass in C, Gade's 'Erl King's daughter,' and the 'Magnificat' by Mr. Davison formed the principal items. The soloists, among whom were Miss M. Phillips, Messrs. E. Marsh, H. Evison, Charles Hawkins, and A. Harris, acquitted themselves with great credit, whilst the choir eclipsed all previous performances in tone, blend, and unanimity of expression in the serious music of the Mass, the lighter and more dramatic strains of Gade, and in the nursery rhyme, 'The Wonderful Inn,' written by the conductor. The sacred music of the programme was repeated at a Free Recital on Sunday, June 11, the 154th given by Mr. Munro Davison at the Northern Polytechnic.

We will deal next month with the concerts that have taken place since June 18, including the highly successful orchestral concert given by Mr. Joseph Ivimey at Queen's Hall on June 19.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BIRMINGHAM.

The only notable feature in local musical matters in the month of June was the series of Theatre Royal Promenade Concerts, which began on June 12. It was the seventh annual season of these delightful musical functions, which now may be said to be established on a sound basis, and in point of excellence almost surpassed all previous efforts. The orchestra of seventy performers was admirably constituted, each department being led by a performer of great experience and technical ability, with Mr. D. Reggel as leader of the first violins. The conductor-in-chief was again Mr. Landon Ronald, who had Mr. Hamilton Harty for assistant-conductor and accompanist, and Mr. Max Mossel again acted as musical director. Many new works by English composers were successfully introduced during the season, and the solo instrumentalists and vocalists had all been chosen with care, including many well-known artists of repute. On Coronation Day a grand choral and orchestral matinée concert was held, assisted by a contingent of the New Choral Society through the courtesy of Mr. Rutland Boughton, who generously undertook the work of rehearsal. The programme on that occasion was composed of works by British composers, including Sir Edward Elgar's arrangement of 'God save the King' and the same composer's 'Coronation Ode,' Sir Hubert Parry's cantata 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' Rutland Boughton's 'March of the British,' and Edward German's bright and spirited 'Welsh Rhapsody.'

CAMBRIDGE.

The University Musical Society has given two very successful concerts during the past term. Miss Susan Metcalfe, Dr. Henschel, and Mr. Borwick gave a delightful pianoforte and vocal recital on May 3. On June 6 the Society was responsible for an excellent performance of Vaughan Williams's fine 'Sea Symphony.' This is a work calculated to try the powers of any body of vocalists, and the result was extremely satisfactory. The composer, who conducted, has introduced various alterations in the work since its production at Leeds. The most important of these is the allotment of the Scherzo to the orchestra alone, and this movement was so played for the first time at this concert. The solo vocalists, Miss Gleeson-White and Mr. Campbell McInnes, sustained their original parts. The programme was completed by Mr. H. Balfour Gardiner's 'Overture to a Comedy,' conducted by the composer, and the Prelude and Liebestod from 'Tristan.'

Dr. Mann and his Festival choir gave an excellent but poorly attended performance of 'Elijah' on June 13.

The numerous College concerts hardly call for notice in these columns, but it may be said that the programmes show a distinct levelling-up in the way of quality, if we compare them with their predecessors of a few years back.

The concert given by St. Catherine's College, on June 12, was no exception to the high standard for which its musical doings have been noted of recent years. The Rev. W. T. Southwood conducted, and Sterndale Bennett's 'The May Queen' was the chief work.

An important addition to the number of fine organs in Cambridge has been made by the erection of a remarkable instrument in Clare Chapel. The builders are Messrs. Harrison & Harrison, of Durham. The specification contains several novel points, and the work has been carried out with great skill. The organ was opened by Mr. T. Tertius Noble, of York, on May 30.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

While Nature is bringing forth her summer bloom music is settling down for its summer sleep, and there is little to chronicle beyond those closing events which tell of a more or less successful season at an end. The Plymouth Library Lectures have run a superlatively successful winter's course, and in their programmes music has received some recognition. The last lecture, on April 29, consisted of a paper by Mr. Reginald Waddy on 'Songs and ballads of the Tudor and Stuart period,' with vocal illustrations introducing two songs written by Henry VIII., one by Anne Boleyn, and one attributed to Charles I. The annual concert in support of the Holiday Fund of the South Devon and Cornwall Institution for the Blind took place on May 25, when Mr. Frederic Weekes, musical director, obtained from his class of blind pupils a creditable performance of Cowen's 'The Rose Maiden,' and of several part-songs.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

With the spirit partly of experiment not unjustified by conviction, and partly in association with the educational scheme now adopted in many of H.M. prisons, the Government has sanctioned the giving of occasional concerts in the Princetown convict establishment.

Mr. Lewis Sydenham has hitherto organized these with much success, and on May 21 three sacred programmes were given under his direction in the general chapel, in the infirmary, and in the R.C. chapel respectively. The party consisted of St. Andrew's Quartet (vocal) and a string quartet, the members severally contributing solos and concerted pieces. In continuation of a series, Mr. R. G. Cawse (organist) gave an organ recital on June 1 in Plympton St. Mary Church, and was presented at the close with a purse of gold as a mark of appreciation from the audience.

CORNWALL.

The Cornwall County Music Competitions ran a week's course from May 16 in a series of contests at Camborne (three days), Truro (one day) and Bodmin (two days).

A new choral society is to be welcomed in the remote but aspiring village of Linkinhorne, where the Vicar, the Rev. C. C. Bosanquet, has been appointed conductor. That the Society will supply a need was proved by the musical success of the initial concert on May 4. The choir numbered thirty, and showed earnestness and care, and gave promise of advancement on right lines in the future. Roedel's cantata 'Merrie Old England' and part-songs were performed, with principal vocalists from the neighbourhood. The concert was repeated at Callington on May 18. Marazion Male-Voice Choir, on May 24, performed the pieces for the singing of which they had been awarded prizes at the recent Music Competitions. Mr. J. H. Trudgen conducted. On the same date, at Liskeard, was produced a new musical play, 'The wave song,' by Mr. A. W. Venning (who conducted), which showed considerable ingenuity in treatment and a good sense of rhythm and melody.

EDINBURGH.

The last of the present series of concerts for young people of school age, given under the management of the Musical Educational Society, was held in the Queen's Hall, on June 2. In the absence of Professor Niecks, who was indisposed, Mr. A. W. Dace presided, and prefaced each number with explanatory remarks. The programme included Beethoven's Sonata in A major, Op. 69, for pianoforte and violoncello, which was finely played by Mr. Paul Della Torre and Mr. D. Millar Craig—who also each contributed solos—and madrigals and part-songs were tastefully sung by Mr. John Kirkhope's choir. These concerts have been greatly appreciated by crowded audiences, and must undoubtedly have had considerable educative influence.

LIVERPOOL.

An interesting prospectus has been issued by the Philharmonic Society for the ensuing winter season. In the orchestral music chosen for performance there is evidence that the committee are seeking to please the subscribers whose taste is for novelty as well as those who are more firmly anchored to Mozart and Beethoven. Neither the 'Messiah' nor the 'Elijah' will be sung, and on the choral nights Dr. Cowen's Cardiff cantata, 'The Veil,' Berlioz's 'Childhood of Christ,' Debussy's 'Blessed Damozel,' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' will be performed. Mr. Wallace's name appears for the first time at these concerts in his symphonic poem 'Villon,' and Mr. Rachmaninoff will conduct his E minor Symphony and play his new Pianoforte concerto No. 3, Op. 30. The new Elgar Symphony and Violin concerto (Mr. Kreisler) are also promised, with symphonies by Kalinikow and Glazounov. The selection of orchestral works shows a decided tendency towards the modern. The conductors will be Sir Frederic Cowen (eight concerts), M. Rachmaninoff, Mr. Thomas Beecham, Mr. Landon Ronald and Sir Henry Wood.

Sir Frederic Cowen has received hearty congratulations from the local musical community, to whom the announcement of his Coronation Knighthood gave great pleasure. As conductor of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, Sir Frederic has rendered distinguished service since 1896.

An interesting series of four musical recitals have been well attended in St. Mary's Church for the Blind, when the organist, Dr. Pollitt and Mr. John Lawson (violin) played selections from violin concertos by Elgar, Goldmark and Spohr, assisted vocally by Mr. Samuel Mann of the Cathedral choir, and Miss Annie Beattie.

The civic celebrations of the Coronation provided on a lavish scale for outdoor music, both choral and instrumental, in all the public parks and recreation grounds. They included a 'Festival of Coronations,' a children's pageant which were enacted in the four principal parks. The subjects were 'Charlemagne,' 'Elizabeth,' 'Peter the Great,' 'The Mikado,' and 'The Durbar.' Each episode was complete in itself, and travelled from park to park with its own performers and military band. The music was under the direction of Mr. Edward Watson, an accomplished local composer who has written a series of five tuneful incidental dances, one of which enlivened each episode.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

Dr. Richter, writing recently from Hungary says: 'The quiet life and sound fresh air induced me to remain here, and I have not regretted my decision because I feel that I will recover and renew my health in this rustic place. No day passes by without my thinking of the happy and glorious days in Manchester, and in England generally, and we all hope we shall return after a short time.'

The annual meeting of the guarantors of the Hallé Concerts Society, on May 29, was expected to be of an unusual character, and events fully bore out such expectations. It was reported that the Pension Fund concert on March 23 had yielded a profit of £440, the services of orchestra, soloists, and conductor being given gratuitously, and it should be noted that the Free Trade Hall was packed, which in the light of statements made subsequently is worthy of notice. Mr. Gustav Behrens, the treasurer, reported that on forty-three concerts—twenty-two of the Hallé series in Manchester, and twenty-one elsewhere—there was a loss of £1,066 17s. 6d. It was not stated whether the Manchester concerts, or the outside ones, were mainly responsible for such deficit; but he did say that the lapse of subscribers in the past six years had entailed a loss of not less than £1,200 per annum. Under the circumstances a call of £7 on each of the 193 guarantors was necessary, this being only the second call made since Sir Charles Hallé's death in 1895. Granville Bantock's 'Omar,' carrying the dead weight of extra choral and orchestral rehearsals, only lost £83, and Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio' £75, against a normal 'Messiah' profit of £100. The closing words of the report were: 'Unless our subscription list is materially increased it is to be feared that this time-honoured institution must come to an end.' At any rate, the prospects for next season are such as to afford greater variety than any of the past twelve seasons. In addition to the names mentioned in my last letter the executive have retained, as guest-conductors, the services of Sir Frederick Bridge to conduct the 'Messiah' (Sir Henry Wood doing 'Elijah' and another concert), Oskar Fried of Berlin, and Ossip Gabrilovich of Munich, who will appear as pianist-conductor.

The choral concerts will provide 'Messiah,' 'Elijah,' 'Gerontius,' 'Spectre's Bride' (rarely heard in Lancashire), and the second movement from Granville Bantock's projected new Choral Symphony, which he has dedicated to the Hallé Choir and its trainer, Mr. R. H. Wilson, to which allusion was made here last month. Müller-Reuter is to do the Beethoven Ninth Symphony. An experiment is to be made, possibly not repeated, of giving two miscellaneous concerts without the band, Ysäye and Fugno having been engaged to play before Christmas, and negotiations are pending for a similarly famous combination in the second half of the season.

Mr. Samuel Langford has long been Max Reger's most ardent advocate in Manchester; in season and out of season no rendering of Reger's work in our midst but has brought from his pen most illuminating and discerning criticism of this much-maligned composer in the columns of the Guardian. It was therefore quite in the fitness of things that the Manchester Musical Society should have brought its first season to a close with an illustrated lecture by Mr. Langford on 'The songs of Max Reger.'

He would liken Reger to Burns, despite the fact that the former, unlike the poet, resorted to the most sophisticated idiom in order to express peasant-character and feeling. Was this quite natural? Yes, argued the lecturer, for the freer human nature becomes, the more elaborate must be its expression. About a score of his best songs were sung by Miss Edith McCullagh, Miss Annie Worsley, and Mr. Charles Neville.

OXFORD.

On May 22, Mr. Plunket Greene gave his now familiar lecture on 'Interpretation in Song' in the Assembly Room of the Town Hall, to a keenly appreciative audience.

The first Eight's-week concert was given by Balliol on May 28, when Miss Fanny Davies, who is an old and welcome friend to Oxford audiences, was the pianist and Miss Phyllis Lett the singer. The principal work given by Miss Davies was Bach's Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue.

On the following day an orchestral concert of unusual interest was given in the Town Hall, under the auspices of the Musical Club. The programme contained Dr. Basil Harwood's Organ concerto, the solo part of which was played by the composer himself. He was deservedly recalled at its conclusion, and warmly applauded by his numerous Oxford friends.

The other notable items were Bach's delightful 'Brandenburg' Concerto in F, and Brahms's third Symphony. Dr. Allen conducted this most enjoyable concert.

On May 30, Exeter College gave its usual concert. The first part consisted of songs and part-songs, of which Stanford's 'Diaphenia,' and Granville Bantock's arrangement of 'Silent, O Moyle,' were the principal items. The second part consisted of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast,' with Mr. Gervase Elwes as soloist. The choir sang excellently, and the concert reflected great credit upon its conductor, Mr. L. A. Collingwood, who is the organ-scholar at Exeter.

On the same date we had Pachmann and Kubelik at the Town Hall, which was densely packed, the former artist playing Chopin almost exclusively, while Kubelik amongst other things gave Vieuxtemps's Concerto in D minor (No. 4), and 'Caprice' in E minor by Paganini.

On May 31 Keble gave a capital concert in the large Dining Hall. The chief vocal numbers were 'Noenia' (Op. 10) by Goetz, and three choral songs from 'From the Bavarian Highlands,' by Elgar. The principal orchestral pieces included were 'Finlandia,' by Sibelius, and Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52.

On June 2, Queen's gave a good concert, though on a smaller scale than usual. It consisted mainly of songs, part-songs, and glees, of which Webbe's 'Discord, dire sister,' and Elgar's 'It's oh! to be a wild wind,' were notably sung under the direction of Dr. Stocks and Dr. Dodds respectively. Three pieces of a light character were neatly played by a wind quintet from London, and afforded a pleasant change from the continuous vocal element.

On June 13, Sir Walter Parratt, the Professor of Music, gave his usual terminal lecture in the Sheldonian Theatre. The subject of 'Dance music and its influence upon the development of the Art' proved very attractive, and drew together a keenly appreciative audience.

The composers of some of these older tunes—said the lecturer—were quite unknown, but it was true to say that in the creation of this class of spontaneous music no nation was richer than our own.

The Professor played his own illustrations, giving examples of many of the older dances, and said that the 'Hornpipe' deserved special mention as this dance-form was included by Handel in his Concerto in G minor, and it was also to be found in a Concerto for stringed instruments by Boyce. The 'Minuet' was also of great historical interest, and it was noteworthy that it had often from very early times found a place in sacred surroundings. The lecturer reminded his hearers that in Handel's oratorio 'Samson' a Minuet would be found in the overture. Another remarkably interesting example to which he called attention was the 'Cushion dance,' mentioned in the 'Dancing Master' (1686) and the only known example of a dance in two different times, the first portion being in a slow tempo, the second Allegro vivace. In conclusion the Professor said he attached great importance to a sense of rhythm being engrafted into our children, and he was glad to note that more attention was now given to it in the High School singing classes.

The chronicle of this term's music would, however, be incomplete without the mention of three performances of 'Der Freischütz' at the New Theatre on June 15, 16 and 17. The opera was produced under the able directorship of Miss R. Filippi (Mrs. H. M. Dowson), and the music under that of Dr. H. P. Allen, with excellent results. Weber's delightful music, in these days of storm and stress, was especially welcome to the ear. The band played throughout con amore, but most notably of course in the overture. The choral portions, a little high and trying in places, were tackled splendidly, and the greatest credit is due to the chorus-master, Mr. B. C. Allichin.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents. Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

BUILTH WELLS.—The Philharmonic Society performed Parts I. and II. of Haydn's 'The Creation' on May 26, under the able direction of Mr. A. P. Morgan. The soloists were Miss Jennie Ellis, Mr. John Roberts, and Mr. David Hughes. An efficient orchestra, led by Mr. Herbert Ware, accompanied. The programme also included German's 'Coronation March' and Cowen's Coronation Ode, 'His Majesty the King,' and, among the smaller items, Elgar's 'Chanson de Matin' and Leslie's 'Lullaby of life,' which were well performed by the orchestra and choir respectively.

CHELTEMHAM.—The Empire Day concert given by the Cheltenham Philharmonic Society in the Town Hall, on May 24, was a great success in every way except as regards the attendance. The chief choral work was Elgar's 'Banner of St. George,' which was well sung, and amongst other part-songs given by the choir was a stirring piece by Cowen, 'His Majesty the King.' Mr. Charles Tree was the special vocalist, but the great attraction was the appearance of Miss Marie Hall, who played Elgar's Violin concerto, Op. 61, in most masterly fashion. Mr. Phillips, the conductor, had, as usual, an excellent band, and the instrumentalists clearly revelled in the music of Sullivan's overture, 'Di Ballo.'

CROYDON.—The string orchestra connected with the Croydon Conservatoire of Music gave a concert in the large Public Hall on May 19. The programme included Symphony in A, No. 29 (Mozart), Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky (Arensky), and 'Russian Suite' (Wilers). Pianoforte solos were contributed by Miss Irene Peckham and Miss E. Ximena Hargraves—two promising students; and Mr. W. H. Reed conducted.

DEVIZES.—On May 31 the Devizes Musical Association gave a Coronation concert in the Corn Exchange. The programme included 'Coronation Ode' (Elgar), and 'The Flag of England' (Bridge). The choral numbers were given in excellent style, and good tone. The principals were Miss Margaret Layton, Miss Esther Franklin, Mr. J. S. Perry, and Dr. Sydney Cole. Mr. J. W. Duys led the orchestra, and also contributed violin solos. Mr. H. H. Baker conducted a very enjoyable concert. The band and choir numbered one hundred performers.

IPSWICH.—The recent performance of 'Gerontius' was so successful, financially as well as artistically, that the local Choral Society has been able to present its conductor, Mr. William Hockey, with a handsome gift, and to carry forward a substantial balance to next year. This is a vast improvement on the position of affairs in past years, when subscribers to the Society had to come to its rescue.—Mr. Ernest Hart recently gave a concert-lecture on 'The growth of modern song.' He was assisted in the musical selections by Miss Gertrude Blomfield, Miss Alice Coppin, and Mr. Maurice Jeffes, three cultivated singers, who sang some beautiful examples of modern songs by Debussy, Elgar, Granville Bantock, Reynaldo Hahn, Bruneau, Richard Strauss, Vaughan Williams, and others. Miss Coppin and Mr. Maurice Jeffes are two young and talented East Anglian vocalists who are likely to be heard much of in the future.

MORTIMER.—Two concerts were recently given by the Choral Society, at which Sterndale Bennett's 'The May Queen' was performed to excellent effect, under the direction of the Rev. F. N. Taylor. The same standard of artistic merit was upheld by the work of the choir and that of the principals, Miss Florence Bloomfield, Miss Pleydell-Bouverie, Mr. H. L. Whittaker, and Mr. Keith Seth-Smith. A small orchestra, assisted at the pianoforte, supplied the accompaniments.

PERTH (W.A.).—Under the patronage of Lady Edeline Strickland, wife of the Governor-General of Western Australia, Miss Fanny (soprano) and Miss Kate Chetham (violinist) gave a concert recently at the Perth Literary Institute. The former sang an excerpt from 'Cavalleria Rusticana' and the waltz-song from Gounod's 'Romeo and Juliet'; and the latter was heard in movements from Beethoven's Sonata Op. 18, and Schumann's Trio, Op. 63.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS.—On June 8 an interesting Coronation Concert was given by Mr. Francis J. Foote's Choir in the Great Halls. This most efficient choir of 120 voices gave masterly readings of Brahms's 'Festival and Commemoration Sentences,' Meyerbeer's '91st Psalm,' and Bach's 'Be not afraid' (all unaccompanied). Professor Hans Wessely played violin solos, and Dr. Theo. Lierhammer sang. Mr. Francis J. Foote conducted his choir, and obtained brilliant results.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's Violin concerto in G minor will be produced, with Miss Maud Powell as soloist, at the coming Festival at Norfolk, Connecticut. It was at the last Norfolk Festival that his 'Bamboula' rhapsodic dance was first performed.

Foreign Notes.

ANTWERP.

On May 15 a new composition, 'Totentanz,' for male-chorus and orchestra, by Heinrich Zöllner, was produced under the composer's direction with great success.

AUGSBURG.

Strauss's 'Der Rosenkavalier' was recently given for the first time at the Stadttheater with so much success that six further performances were arranged.

BERLIN.

At the Royal Opera, Gluck's 'Iphigenia in Aulis,' in Richard Wagner's edition, has been revived after a long rest. The masterly work enjoyed the greatest interest.—Ignaz Waghalter's opera, 'Der Teufelsweg,' was recently produced at the Komische Oper.—Under the conductorship of Herr Leo Schratzenholz, the four symphonic pictures 'Aus Finland,' by Selim Palmgren, were given for the first time in Berlin at a concert of the Symphonie-Verein.—At the second historic organ recital given in the Domkirche, by Herr Bernhard Irrgang, an interesting programme included a Sonata by Giovanni Battista Bassani (1650-1713), 'Elevazione,' by Monari di Bologna (born about 1670), and the 'Canzone' from a Sonata for organ and cembalo by Domenico Zipoli (born about 1675). Of modern works Enrico Bossi's Sonata in D minor, parts of a Sonata by Filippo Capocci, and Elgar's Sonata in G major were heard.

BERNBURG.

Under the conductorship of Herr Franz Mikorey the eighteenth Anhalt Musical Festival took place on May 13 and 14. The programmes included Liszt's symphonic poem 'Festklänge,' Pianoforte concerto in A major (soloist Herr Joseph Pembaur), and 13th Psalm for tenor solo, chorus and orchestra; Strauss's 'Symphonia Domestica,' and 'Wanderers Sturmlied' for six-part chorus and orchestra; Beethoven's ninth Symphony; and the final scene of the 'Meistersinger.'

BRUSSELS.

Some excellent choral performances have lately taken place. The Deutsche Gesangverein have given Max Bruch's 'Die Glocke' for the first time; and at the Bach Festival excellent performances of the 'St. John' Passion music and the B minor Mass have been given, under the baton of M. Albert Zimmer.

BUDA PEST.

Some interesting national compositions, including Béla Bartók's orchestral Suite, Akos von Buttykay's 'Salammbô-Symphony' (after Flaubert's novel), and a clever 'Burleske' by Ladislaus Toldy have been given near the end of the season at the concerts of the Akademie-Orchester and the Landes-Symphonie-Orchester. Herr Michael Balling's appointment as Generalmusikdirektor and artistic adviser to the Royal Opera, has met with much disapproval in the national Press.

BUENOS-AYRES.

Mascagni's much discussed opera 'Isabeau' (Ysobel) was at last produced here on June 3, under the composer's direction, at the Coliseo Theatre. The information to hand reports a great popular and artistic success.

COPENHAGEN.

At the last concert of the Musikforeningen, Professor Neruda introduced the choral work 'Sct Hans,' by the young Danish composer, Ludolf Nielsen, with great success.—On the same occasion Bruckner's Mass in F minor was given for the first time.

DORTMUND.

On May 14 Professor Janssen produced the new choral work, 'Das Licht,' by Adolf Lorenz, with considerable success.

DRESDEN.

The appearance of Dr. Max Reger in the treble capacity of composer, conductor, and solo pianist, was the outstanding feature of the seventh and last Symphony Concert of the Königliche Kapelle. On this occasion his Pianoforte concerto in F minor, and the fine orchestral Variations on a Theme by Joh. Adam Hiller were given, and Dr. Reger himself played the pianoforte part of Bach's fifth 'Brandenburg' Concerto (pianoforte, violin, flute and string orchestra).—On June 8, Herr Karl Scheidemantel, the famous baritone, made his farewell appearance in the part of Hans Sachs at the Opera, where he has been a conspicuous worker for thirty years.—Strauss's 'Der Rosenkavalier' has recently been given for the twenty-fifth time (the theatre having been sold out at twenty-two performances).

DUSSELDORF.

The following works were performed at the Festival which took place on June 4, 5, and 6. 'The Messiah' (in a somewhat modernized version, by Josef Reiter); 'Ein Heldenleben,' Strauss; 100th Psalm, Max Reger; third 'Brandenburg' concerto, Bach; 'Choral Symphony,' Beethoven. The entire musical direction was in the hands of Professor Karl Panzner; the soloists included Messrs. Ysaye and Lamond.

ESSEN.

An interesting programme was submitted at the fifth concert of the Essener Musikverein (conductor, Professor Witte). It included Scheinpfug's 'Overture to a Shakespearian comedy,' 'Hochzeitslied' for chorus and orchestra by Max Schillings, Joachim's 'Hungarian' Violin concerto (soloist, Professor Karl Flesch), and Richard Strauss's early Symphony in F minor.

HALLE.

A Beethoven Festival took place on May 20-21. Three concerts were given, the programmes of which included the Symphonies No. 1 and 7, the rarely-heard Triple Concerto (soloists, Herr Arthur Schnabel, Professor Karl Klingler, and Mr. Arthur Williams), and the 'Missa solennis,' given under the direction of Herr Ferdinand Loewe. The Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra had been specially engaged for the Festival.

INSTERBURG.

The sixth Litaian Musical Festival took place in the Tivoli Theatre under the conductorship of Musikdirektor Franz Nots. Among the works performed were Liszt's 'Faust,' Symphony, Verdi's 'Requiem,' and a concert version of Peter Cornelius's rarely-heard comic opera, 'Der Barbier von Bagdad.'

JENA.

Siegmund von Hausegger's 'Totenmarsch,' for male chorus, bass solo and orchestra, and the Symphonic-Ode 'Das Meer,' by Jean Louis Nicodé, were both given for the first time at a concert of the Bürgerliche Gesangsverein.

LEIPZIG.

On May 20-22, the second Bach Festival took place amid great public interest. Of the master's sacred works the 'St. John' Passion music, the motets 'Komm, Jesu, komm,' 'Fürchte dich nicht,' and the Cantatas 'Sie werden aus Saba kommen,' 'O Jesu Christ, mein Lebens Licht,' 'Brich dem Hungrigen dein Brot,' and the 'Trauermusik' composed on the occasion of the death of Kurfürst Christiane Eberhardine von Sachsen-Polen, were given. The Sonata with chorus, 'Der Himmel lacht, die Erde jubiliert,' and the Himmelfahrts-Oratorium 'Lobet Gott in seinen Reichen,' and five sacred tenor songs with organ ('Mein Jesu, was für Seelenweh,' 'Es ist vollbracht, Liebster Jesu, wo bleibst du so lange,' 'Jesus unser Trost und Leben' and 'Bist du bei mir') were also performed. The secular portion of the programme included the 'Coffee Cantata,' and a selection of Bach's finest instrumental music (the orchestral Suite in C major, the fourth and sixth 'Brandenburg' Concertos, the C minor Trio for violin, flute, and pianoforte, from 'Das musikalische Opfer,' the 'Goldberg' Variations, and many works for pianoforte, organ, violin and violoncello). The conductors of the Festival, Professor Gustav Schreck and Professor Karl Straube, showed an intimate knowledge and appreciation of Bach's music, as did the soloists, Professor Karl Flesch (violin), Herr Julius Kengel (violoncello), Dr. Max Reger (pianoforte), and the tenor, Herr George A. Walter. A special Divine service was held in the Thomaskirche. It might be added that the town council had voted a substantial subsidy.

LEMBERG.

Under the direction of M. Antonio Ribera a complete cycle of Wagner's 'Der Ring des Nibelungen' has recently been given for the first time in the Polish language with very great success.

MANNHEIM.

The eighth and last Akademie-Concert was, with the exception of the Prelude to Wagner's 'Parsifal,' devoted to compositions by Gustav Mahler. Under the conductorship of Herr Bodansky (a pupil of Mahler), the 'Kindertotenlieder' and the second Symphony in C minor, considered by many the composer's best work, were performed with very great success.

MOSCOW.

Under the direction of M. W. Bulytochew, Bach's B minor Mass was recently given for the first time in Russia.—Five Pianoforte sonatas by Alexandre Scriabine were performed at a recital recently given by Madame Vera Scriabine.

MUNICH.

Victor Gluth's three-act opera 'Zlatorog' has been produced at the Royal Opera with great success, under the direction of Herr Felix Mottl.—Under the auspices of the Neue Verein (formed specially for the purpose), Hans Pitzner's opera 'Der arme Heinrich' was performed on May 29 at the Prinzregententheater with great success. This composer is officially boycotted from the repertoire of the Royal Opera owing to disagreements that arose last year in connection with the work given on this occasion.

NURNBERG.

Almost at the close of the season the Municipal Theatre gave the first performance in Germany of Massenet's opera 'Don Quichotte.' The work was well received.

VEVEY.

The twelfth musical festival of the Swiss Tonkünstlerverein took place on May 20-21. Two orchestral and choral concerts and two chamber music performances were given. Among the works played were Paderewski's Symphony Op. 24, Symphony No. 2, by Fritz Brun, String quartets by Otto Barban and Friedrich Klose, 'Chanson des regrets' by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, and the Violin concerto by Othmar Schoeck.

WÜRZBURG.

In anticipation of the approaching Liszt centenary the Königliche Musikschule gave a fine performance of the 'Gräner Festmesse' and the '13th Psalm.'

PARIS.

Massenet's opera Thérèse (recently produced in Monte-Carlo) has been given at the Opéra-Comique for the first time in Paris with great success. On the same occasion a one-act opera, 'L'heure espagnole,' by Maurice Ravel, published in 1909, was produced.—Grisar's old opera, 'Les Amours du Diable,' has been revived at the Trianon-Lyrique.—At the Châtelet Theatre, Gabriel d'Annunzio's five-act 'mystère,' 'Le Martyre de Saint-Sébastien' (in the author's original French), with most interesting incidental music by Debussy, has been produced, creating a deep impression. The story is that of 'The Golden Legend.' The part of the saint was created by the Russian dancer Mlle. Ida Rubinstein.—Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera 'La fiancée du Tsar' has been performed for the first time outside Russia during the Russian opera season, which has taken place at the Théâtre Sarah-Bernhardt (where his opera-ballet 'Sadko' has also been given).—At the Théâtre Apollo a new operetta, 'Les Transatlantiques,' by Claude Terrasse, has been produced with success.—Bruneau's opera 'L'Attaque du Moulin' was lately performed for the hundredth time in Paris, at the Théâtre Lyrique de la Gaité.—Umberto Giordano's opera 'Sibérie' has been given for the first time at the Grand Opéra.

PRAGUE.

The hundredth anniversary (May 1) of the opening of the Prague Conservatoire was celebrated with three festival concerts, when classical works and compositions by Josef Krejci, Josef Suk, Karl Bendl, Josef B. Förster, Vitezlav Novák, Anton Dvořák, Kalliwoda and other former pupils of the institution were given. A very interesting exhibition of documents, old instruments, autographs and pictures belonging to the Conservatoire was also organized in connection with the celebrations. Among the assisting artists, all former pupils of the Conservatoire, were the Bohemian String Quartet, Herr Ondricek, and other well-known musicians.

ROME.

Under the direction of Signor Toscanini, Puccini's 'La Fanciulla del West' has been performed at the Costanzi theatre for the first time in Italy with not unqualified success.—Signor Toscanini also conducted fine performances of Verdi's 'Falstaff.'

ST. PETERSBURG.

Alexander Scriabine's new tone-poem 'Prometheus' was introduced at the last Kussewitzky Concert.—At the hundred and sixty-fifth Scheremeteff Concert (fourteenth season), Count Scheremeteff himself conducted an excellent performance of Elgar's 'The Apostles.'

STOCKHOLM.

Under the direction of M. Voghera, Moussorgsky's 'Boris Godounoff' had a great success when recently given at the opera for the first time.

STUTTGART.

Max Schillings's comic opera 'Der Pfeifertag' has been performed for the first time at the Court Opera, under the composer's direction.

WIESBADEN.

At the Royal Opera three festival command performances were given on May 10-13, in the presence of the German Emperor. The works chosen were Boieldieu's 'Die weisse Dame,' Auber's 'Masaniello,' and Weber's 'Oberon.'

A demonstration of school-singing will be given at the Royal Academy of Music, Tenterden Street, Hanover Square, W., on Monday, July 24, at 7.30 p.m., to the Canadian teachers visiting England under the auspices of the League of Empire. Dr. W. G. McNaught will take the chair. A programme of school music will be given by a choir of 150 children, consisting of sixty girls from the Farmer Road School, Leyton (the choir from which school gained a great reputation at Blackpool Festival last October), sixty boys from the London College for Choristers, and girls from the Francis Holland School, Graham Street, Eaton Square, S.W., some of whom will play the violin obligati to Sir Edward Elgar's part-songs, 'The snow' and 'Fly, singing bird.' The programme will include folk-songs and part-songs by Sir Edward Elgar, Dr. Walford Davies, Sir Hubert Parry, Handel, Brahms, Wagner, Mendelssohn, Smart, Goring Thomas, &c. Dr. McNaught, Miss Margaret Nicholls, and Mr. James Bates will conduct. A special feature of the demonstration will be an exhibition of the Jaques-Dalcroze rhythmic gymnastics by girls from the Moira House School, Eastbourne, under the direction of Miss Kathleen O'Dowd and Miss Muirhead, who have studied under Dalcroze himself. A very limited number of tickets will be issued to the heads of musical organizations, musical directors and inspectors under education committees, and principals of schools and other educationists specially interested in children's singing. The tickets can be obtained on application, by letter only, to Mr. James Bates, the Royal Academy of Music, Hanover Square, W.

The School of Folk-Song and Dance that will be open at Stratford-upon-Avon, from July 22 to August 19, during the Summer Shakespeare Festival will be organised and directed by Mr. Cecil J. Sharp, assisted by Miss Mattie Kay and a staff of certificated teachers. The course will include lectures by the Director and others upon the Folk-lore, Theory, and History of English Folk-Art; and classes will be held every day at which Folk-songs and dances will be taught.

Dr. Gratton Flood asks us to point out that since writing his article on Henry Abyndon, which appeared in the June issue, he has discovered that on October 1, 1431, Master Henry Abyndon was appointed a Canon of Wells. He writes: 'Is it possible that the great singer and organist is the same as this Canon? If so he must have been appointed when very young, as he lived until 1497. But it is likely—and after all, eighty is not so old.'

A pleasing incident of the Kaiser's recent visit to London and a most gracious proof of His Majesty's interest in music was the presentation to the Royal Academy of Music of a handsome volume containing the musical compositions of Prince Louis Ferdinand of Prussia. The volume was received by the Principal, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, from the German Ambassador, and is now added to the Library of the Institution.

The honorary degree of Doctor of Music has been conferred by the University of New York upon William C. Carl, organist and director of music in the Old First Presbyterian Church, and Director of the Guilman Organ School.

Mr. P. Jackson, pupil of the Manchester School of Music, has been appointed professor of the violoncello and pianoforte at the Training College, Grahamstown, Cape Colony. He studied the violoncello under Mr. F. A. Greenwood.

Dr. H. A. Harding lectured on 'Organ touch and phrasing' at the Royal College of Music, Manchester, on May 27. We hope to devote some space to his remarks in the near future.

The Birmingham Orchestral Society (an amateur body), which is conducted by Mr. Arthur Cooke, made a profit of £8 on its last season's operations. It would be interesting to know how this unusual feat was accomplished.

The annual dinner of the Royal College of Organists took place at the Café Monico on June 8. Sir George Martin was in the chair.

A paper on 'Key relationship in early mediæval music' was read by the Rev. W. H. Frere on June 20 at a meeting of the Musical Association.

The Coronation March by Mr. Edward German performed in Westminster Abbey at the Coronation of His Majesty King George V. will be published shortly by Messrs. Novello & Co.

Answers to Correspondents.

J. W. Y. B. (Towcester).—We do not know of any book on Rheinberger and his works. The articles in Grove's Dictionary and in Dr. Riemann's Dictionary give some information. With reference to the inquiry in our May issue as to whether Grell's 'Missa Solemnis' had been performed in London. Dr. Crament writes to say that he heard it given in the early eighties, in St. James's Hall, but he cannot remember the name of the conductor and choir.

J. P. H.—The R.A.M. examination for teachers of voice-culture for boys and girls, and class singing, is best prepared for by studying Mr. Bates's books on 'Voice-culture for children' (Nos. 71, 72, 73, 73A, of Novello's Primer Series), and the tonic sol-fa system, including its application to the staff. The art of class management is fully dealt with in 'The School Music Teacher,' published by Curwen.

EUREKA (Ballarat).—The copyright of the original version of Wagner's 'Ring' has expired. Therefore it is open to anyone to print, copy, or perform the work. But all English versions of the works are copyright. We thank you for your tribute to the utility of the Musical Times.

G. W. B.—We do not know the origin of the words of Farrant's anthem, 'Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake.'

G. F. B.—The last movement of the 'Jupiter' Symphony (Mozart) employs a subject used by Bach.

HARVEST COVENANT

A SACRED CANTATA.

FOR SOLO VOICES (S.C.T.B.), CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

The Words chiefly selected from the Revised Version of the Scriptures.

THE MUSIC BY

A. L. COWLEY.

CONTENTS.

- No. 1.—THE CREATOR'S GIFTS.
No. 2.—THE EVERLASTING COVENANT.
No. 3.—THE PROMISE OF PLENTY.
No. 4.—THE HARVEST PSALM (Psalm LXV.).
No. 5.—THE COVENANT KEEPER.

Each number is complete in itself and suitable for separate performance. For Harvest Festivals and other special occasions the length of service can readily be arranged as required.

Twenty-two Choirs of Enfield, Enfield Highway, Winchmore Hill and District united in a performance of this work. "A splendid performance, —in every way a success.—Of the work itself we cannot speak too well,—the Cantata will rank among the high-standard musical works."—The Enfield Observer, September 30, 1910.

NEW HARVEST ANTHEMS

By CALEB SIMPER.

- *GREAT IS THE LORD. Just published .. .. 3d.
Opens with a broad, majestic and powerful chorus. This is followed by a sweet Soprano Solo (or Sop. Full) which leads to some spirited and imitative movements for the different voices, with beautiful modulations.
*THE LORD THY GOD HATH BLESSED THEE. New .. 13th 1000 4d.
Contains a rolling Bass Solo, a Sop. or Tenor Solo, with bold and interesting choruses, also a soft chorus which would be extremely effective as a quartet.
*SEEDTIME AND HARVEST. New .. .. 11th 1000 3d.
An attractive Anthem, easy, melodious, and full of inspiration.
*THOU VISITEST THE EARTH .. .. 12th 1000 4d.
One of the most effective Harvest Anthems.
*CANTATE AND DEUS IN F. New .. .. 6th 1000 4d.
Grand, powerful, and expressive. Especially suitable for Harvest.
*THOU PROVIDEST FOR THE EARTH .. .. 24th Edition 4d.
*FOOD AND GLADNESS .. .. 15th 1000 3d.
*THE FLOORS SHALL BE FULL OF WHEAT .. .. 11th 1000 4d.

Complete edition, bound with HYMNS ANCIENT AND MODERN (Quarto), 6s. 6d. net.

As its name implies, this book is designed for use with, and not in place of, other Church Hymnals.For this reason the Hymns are numbered from 801, so that the numbers may not interfere with the use of any other hymn book, no other Church hymn book having as many as even seven hundred hymns. Each hymn has its own distinctive tune, and no hymn or tune in this work is found in Hymns Ancient and Modern (Old Edition), so that with the two books no duplication occurs.

SEVENTH AND REVISED EDITION.

A HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS IN MUSIC

CONTAINING

600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY

ERNEST A. DICKS,

Fellow of the Royal College of Organists.

PREFACE TO THE SEVENTH EDITION.

Through the kindness of Dr. E. H. Turpin the seventh edition of the Handbook of Examinations in Music includes the latest type of Papers set by Trinity College of Music, London, in their scheme of Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge.

The work will also be found to have been considerably enlarged by the addition of fifty specimen questions, with answers. They have been designed for the most part after the manner of those set in the Theory Paper for the L.R.A.M. Diploma, and also that required by candidates for the Higher Practical Examinations held by Trinity College of Music, London. The author earnestly hopes that these additions will considerably enhance the value of the Handbook, and render it increasingly helpful to students.

TECHNIQUE AND EXPRESSION IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING BY FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or, briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cetera.

PROGRESSIVE STUDIES

FOR THE PIANOFORTE

EDITED, ARRANGED IN GROUPS, AND THE FINGERING REVISED AND SUPPLEMENTED
BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

THIS Collection of Studies is intended to illustrate the various elements of a complete course of pianoforte technique, and to provide students with the means of attacking and overcoming the different special difficulties which have to be encountered. With this view, the Studies have been arranged in groups, those in each group being placed in progressive order, and having reference to some one particular difficulty. The greater part of the studies themselves have been selected from the standard works of the most eminent Study-writers, and with these are included numerous others, which, though of equally great practical utility, have hitherto been less generally accessible.

FROM THE ABOVE:

SELECTED PIANOFORTE STUDIES

PROGRESSIVELY ARRANGED BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

IN TWO SETS (EIGHT BOOKS), PRICE ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE EACH BOOK.

The present collection of Studies is designed to provide teachers with a short course of Pianoforte Technique adapted to the needs of the average pupil, the intention being to spare the teacher the labour of choosing a sufficiently varied selection from the large mass of material existing, and at the same time to ensure that the different departments of technique shall be undertaken in the order which experience has proved to be the most beneficial.

The Studies are grouped in two Sets, and are so arranged that the different Books in which they are contained may be taken in consecutive order, but pupils who are already further advanced than the elementary stage represented by Set I. may commence at once with Set II., which will be found to be complete in itself, and to illustrate all the essential elements of technique.

Where additional studies are desired, or studies on certain subjects which are not touched upon in this series, the larger collection, published under the title of "Progressive Studies" (from which the present examples have been selected), is of course available.

COMPLETION OF A Modern School for the Violin

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ AND JAMES BROWN.

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" consists of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a large number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE. IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of DAILY TECHNICAL PRACTICE. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c., with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this Section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES. IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each Book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on, and the appropriate pairs are now issued bound together in cloth (see Cloth Bindings below).

The image shows a page from a musical score for the song "The Rose Tree." It features five staves. The first four staves are vocal parts, each with a treble clef and a key signature of one flat (B-flat). The lyrics "joyce, will re joyce . . . and be glad in it." are written below the notes. The fifth staff is for the Trombone, indicated by a "Trombe." label and a bass clef. The music is in a simple, folk-like style with a mix of eighth and quarter notes.

THE NEW PIANIST

is not one who undergoes a daily grind at the keyboard to "keep in practice," but one who, freed from all the usual drudgery, can devote himself entirely to the spirit of the music, unhampered by any technical difficulties.

This revolution in the Art is effected by the introduction of the well-known MACDONALD SMITH SYSTEM. Little can be explained in an advertisement, but full details of the Postal Course are given in the Illustrated Book, "Light on Pianoforte Playing," sent free by post.

COMPLETE COURSE OF LESSONS BY CORRESPONDENCE,

THREE GUINEAS (by instalments if desired).

THE "STUMBLING-BLOCK" WITH PIANOFORTE STUDENTS.

Of all the obstacles to be overcome by the student of the pianoforte, the greatest are associated with sight-playing.

This is not surprising when it is remembered that the act of sight-playing depends upon the "linking-up" of the nerves of the eye and the muscles of the arms and hands, so that the correct keys are played at the sight of the printed symbols.

It is not a question of musical knowledge, nor can this "linking-up" be effected by constant practising.

The EHREMEYER SYSTEM of Pianoforte Sight-Playing does effect this automatic association or "linking-up" between the eye-nerves and the playing muscles, and by its aid every student is enabled to play all his new music at first sight.

Three months of about fifteen minutes daily is all the time required for the practice.

Numbers of students testify to the wonderful improvement in their Sight-Playing after taking the Course of lessons.

The Booklet describing the System is worth your perusal—you can have it free on application.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

From the opening Allegretto scherzando—a particularly fresh and blithesome section—to the concluding Gavotte and Musette, the music runs a simple, melodious course. . . . The work is conceived throughout in a joyous mood, but the composer, by his deft use of rhythms, never allows the hearer to experience any sense of sameness.

STANDARD.

On many occasions Mr. Percy Pitt has proved his versatile musical gifts, but rarely have they been indicated in a more attractive way and with such a pleasant vein of fancy as in his "Serenade." . . . These five sketches are like little water-colours in their lightness of design and delicacy of hue, and appeal to the imagination because of their unpretentious, simple, yet interesting character.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

The "Serenade" scored one of the most brilliant successes of the season. It has everything in its favour—melody, piquant orchestration, and clever musicianship.

DAILY MAIL.

It is a work which should be immensely popular.

DAILY NEWS.

The Suite as a whole made very pleasant hearing, and should prove popular with conductors of small orchestras.

SUNDAY TIMES.

Its melodiousness, clearness, and deft orchestration make it delightful hearing.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The removal of the Royal Academy of Music to its commodious new building in Marylebone Road, which will take place next month, opens up a prospect of a fresh era of usefulness for an institution which for generations past has been one of the most potent educational forces in this country. A great number of the best known British musicians—composers, executants, and teachers—received their training and inspiration at the Tenterden Street Mecca. Old students now living must be excused feeling a pang at the thought that the ancient and undeniably inconvenient conglomeration of rooms and embarrassing corkscrew staircases will now pass away, with all their human associations so closely attached to the personalities of fellow-students and more or less patient professors. In an unpublished article by Mr. Frederick Corder, from which we are kindly permitted to quote, the Tenterden Street premises are thus described :

Tenterden Street only contains six houses, all on the north side. No. 1 originally belonged to Mrs. Jordan, the actress (a present from William IV.), and was afterwards for many years the home of the Arts Club. The other houses were aristocratic residences in a state of decadence, No. 4 being a disused town mansion of the Earls of Carnarvon. This became, in 1823, the home of the newly established Academy. It is a grim, flat-faced piece of Georgian brick-work, dating from about 1750, with interesting wood-carving in some of the doorways and a few really beautiful marble mantelpieces, to which time, ably assisted by several generations of music students, has been very unkind. The earliest pupils, who were all children of between ten and fifteen, lived on the premises and must have yearned for some mischief to do in their brief hours of idleness. There was a garden at the back (now a carriage factory), but this was little better than a yard, for a high wall was erected down the length of it to keep the little people in muslin skirts and straw poke bonnets from associating with the little people in nankeen tights and blue swallow-tailed coats. History relates that an incessant shower of notes—not musical ones—flew over this wall; from which it would appear that our forefathers' methods of restraint were inferior to our modern plan of teaching girls and boys to associate with one another on equal terms.

The Royal Academy of Music, as an educational institution, was founded in 1822. Before that time, even so far back as 1720, there was a society that used this name, but it existed for the purpose of promoting Italian opera in this country, and not for teaching. It survived only seven years. In the Rev. W. W. Cazalet's 'History of the Royal Academy of Music' (published in 1854) we are told that Dr. Burney in 1774 endeavoured to establish an Academy in conjunction with the Foundling Hospital, the best gifted children in which institution were to form the nucleus. But the Governors objected on the ground that the children were to be trained up to useful purposes, with a singleness that would ward off all ambition for what was higher, and teach them to repay the benefit of their support by cheerful labour. Music was an art or luxury, by no means requisite to life or necessary to morality. To stimulate these [the Foundling children] to superior views might mar the religious object of the charity, which was to nullify, rather than extinguish, all disposition to pride, vice, or voluptuousness, such as, probably, had demoralized their culpable parents, and thrown these deserted outcasts on the mercy of the Foundling Hospital.

This high-sounding rhetoric, which betrayed a deplorable lack of perception of the mission of music, disheartened Dr. Burney, but in abandoning his scheme he ventured to say to the Committee, in diction equal to their own in its ornate rotundity, that he recommended to their mature reflection whether it were not more pious, as well as more rational, to endeavour to ameliorate the character and lives of practical musical noviciates, than to behold the nation, in its highest classes, cherish the art, follow it, embellish it with riches, and make it fashion and pleasure, while, to train to that art, with whatever precautions, its appropriate votaries from the bosom of our own country, seemed to call for opposition and to deserve condemnation.

After this failure no further effort was made to establish a National School of Music until about 1820, when patriotic amateurs became alive to the need for such an institution. Various schemes were proposed, but that advocated under the name of the Royal Academy of Music found most favour, and drew around its promoters influential amateur support. It was, however, opposed by the profession generally, on the ground that there were already too many musicians, many of whom were unable to gain a livelihood; and, further, it was argued that if such an institution as that proposed was established, it should be solely under the control of the profession and not managed by a committee of amateur patrons.

On behalf of the profession an elaborate scheme, signed by T. F. Walmisley (father of Thomas Attwood Walmisley, Mus. Doc.), was proposed, under which an Academy was to be allied to the Philharmonic Society, and to become, in fact, a branch of its operations. The hope was expressed that

When the establishment has acquired solidity by time, respect by wise management, and success by desert—when it is regarded as the pure fountain of musical erudition in this country, some parts of its funds might be gratefully employed in conferring medals, or other insignia or distinction, on the most celebrated composers and performers of the age.

This proposition failed to draw adequate support, and it was soon abandoned. John Fane (Lord Burghersh), eleventh Earl of Westmorland; a distinguished musical amateur,* was meanwhile busying himself in the matter on more practical lines. At a meeting held at the Thatched House Tavern, London, on July 5, 1822, he proposed plans for the establishment of an Academy of Music, and he secured the cordial support of an influential audience.

The patronage of King George IV. was obtained, rules and regulations were drawn up, and Dr. Crotch was appointed principal. A tactful appeal to the profession, signed by Lord Burghersh, secured their cordial co-operation. Over thirty of their number were appointed professors, and negotiations for premises were opened. The choice, as we all know, fell upon No. 4, Tenterden Street, Hanover Square, and on March 24, 1823, the institution was open to the public, and on that day the first lesson was given by Cipriani Potter to Master Kellow Pye. It was regulated that all the students should at the beginning of the course be between the ages of 10 and 15, and the number of pupils was not to exceed forty boys and forty girls. Two classes of pupils were provided for: foundationers who paid 10 guineas per annum towards the cost of their board, lodging, and education, and extra students who paid 20 guineas per annum for musical education only. The pupils were selected by nomination and examination. Eleven boys and ten girls were admitted as foundation scholars, and seven boys and eight girls as extra scholars. Lord Burghersh had been compelled to return to his duties as Ambassador at the Court of Florence, but he retained his deep interest in the Academy, and was regularly furnished with reports of its doings.

A letter from the Rev. John Miles (the headmaster for the general and religious education of students) to his Lordship affords a glimpse of some of the practical difficulties inseparable from all musical instruction given to numerous individuals under one roof. In a postscript Mr. Miles says:

I had forgotten to mention to your Lordship the practising upon more than one instrument in the same room. There are three pianos and a harp in the largest room, and two pianos in another; and I understand from the boys [nothing is said about the girls] that, at first, they found the noise [!] of the different instruments unpleasant; but now, I find, they experience no interruption from the various sounds; as that caused by the instrument at which the boy sits so overpowers the others, as regards his ear, that he scarcely hears it [them?]; and certainly it has this advantage, that it makes each boy attentive to his own work. We are able to give a room to each of those who practise the violins and violoncellos.

In view of this statement as to the tolerance and receptivity of the section of the brain impressed by music, it is not a little strange that the use of some very modern musical idioms did not begin at this period. One cannot help suspecting that not a few of our modern composers must have had their ears and imagination trained on this severe system.

In a very long general report issued by the committee in June, 1823, there is the following further reference to simultaneous practice of different pieces in one room, and it is even claimed that it is universally allowed to be highly beneficial:

It may, perhaps, be proper to notice a practice which has been introduced into the Academy; and which, being new in this country, has been exposed to much observation. The committee allude to that of several of the pupils practising their lessons in the same room at the same time. In justification of themselves in this arrangement, the committee might plead that, unless every boy and every girl had a room for themselves, or very nearly so, it could not be otherwise. Even with the limited numbers of which the Academy at present consists, its impossibility must be apparent; but this objection becomes perfectly ridiculous when it is applied to the numbers of which other seminaries of a similar nature consist, and to which it is hoped this may ultimately extend. But the committee are more anxious to defend the measure than themselves, and have to state that in all the Conservatories in Italy, from whence the most able professors have sprung, this is the uniform custom; and so far from being prejudicial, it is universally allowed to be highly beneficial, it forces attention, it prevents the pupil from trusting to his ear, and obliges him to attend to his notes. The opponents of the system in this country allow that it makes steady players, but they assert that it is the destruction of taste. The answer to this objection is evident. The taste of the Italians is universally acknowledged; and no practice introduced into the seminaries which have produced their greatest masters, can be prejudicial to that very quality for which they are pre-eminently distinguished.

It is worthy of note that in a letter dated November 18, 1823, from Sir Gore Ouseley (who was a member of the committee of management and father of the better-known musician bearing that name) to Lord Burghersh, a proposition to induce Rossini to join the professorial staff is discussed. Sir Gore Ouseley says:

I am not prepared to say anything on the subject of Rossini; in our incipient and wretched funds, we find Crotch and his assistant amply sufficient for the lessons requisite in harmony and composition. Yet it would be a matter of deep regret to me, not to employ so illustrious a person. When his name was last mentioned at the committee, I rather think that the majority imagined we could not employ him; but that is some time ago.

Early in 1824 the financial situation became grave, and abandonment of the scheme seemed imminent. But, happily, the persistent faith of Lord Burghersh and others, backed by the self-sacrifice of the professors, enabled the committee to tide over the crisis. In 1826 an endeavour to obtain a subsidy from the government was unsuccessful, but a charter was promised. This important recognition of the status of the Academy was not actually granted until June 23, 1830, on which date it was signed by King George IV., only three days before his death. In 1832 Dr. Crotch resigned his post as principal, and Cipriani Potter was appointed. On the musical side the Academy was now making satisfactory progress, and its financial condition continued to improve. By order of King William IV. a quarter of the proceeds of the Handel festival held in Westminster Abbey in 1834 was handed to the Academy. This share amounted to £2,500. No development of great importance took place during Cipriani Potter's régime, until 1853, when once again financial embarrassment had to be faced. Hitherto the committee had been constituted wholly of amateur patrons, and it was now decided that the professorial staff should share responsibility. A drastic change of policy was immediately resolved upon, the Academy ceasing to lodge and board the students. Trouble, however, was not over, for the co-opted advisory board of professors was abolished in 1856, but in 1859, on the retirement of Cipriani Potter, it was reconstituted. Charles Lucas was now appointed principal, and the scheme worked until 1864, when the board of professors resigned their share in the management, but they retained their interest in the Academy and submitted a memorial to the Government asking for an annual grant. Mr. Gladstone, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, received a deputation of the professors, with the result that a sum of £500 was allocated to the Academy in the ensuing estimates. Charles Lucas resigned his post in 1866, and was succeeded by Sterndale Bennett.

In 1867 a great crisis arose. Mr. Disraeli was now in office, and he stated in the House of Commons that the Government would not recommend any increase of the grant, 'the results of the institution not being in fact of a satisfactory character.' The next blow was the withdrawal of the grant on the ground that the Government contemplated the establishment of a system of musical instruction under their direct control. It was evident, therefore, that some forces against the Academy were at work. A majority of the committee decided thereupon to close the institution, and to resign the charter. Fortunately, it was discovered that they had no power to commit this suicidal act unless every member of the Academy concurred. In the end the professors contrived to retain the charter, a new board of directors was formed under Earl Dudley, and in 1868, on the return of a new Government, which brought Mr. Gladstone again into power, the grant of £500 was renewed. The number of pupils now greatly increased, adjoining buildings were leased, and in 1876 a new concert hall was built, being ingeniously fitted on to the old structure, and proving to be a great boon. Sterndale Bennett died in 1875, and he was succeeded by George Alexander Macfarren.

We now reach a period well within the recollection of many ex-students spread far and wide over the world of music, who will recall the influence exerted by this able and distinguished musician, who, during this honourable and useful part of his career, was totally blind. He had a strong and somewhat austere personality, and was a moral as well as a musical mentor. We may now say, sapiently, that he failed to estimate adequately the forces that were then creating new idioms in music—he was a pronounced anti-Wagnerite—but we cannot withhold a tribute of admiration to the man who fought so sturdily and consistently for his opinions.

Under Macfarren the musical reputation of the Academy continued to increase, and the institution seemed to be placed upon the solid basis of public utility. But trouble arose that once again threatened its existence as a separate and independent body. This story, and an account of the existing régime, must be reserved for a second article.

THE MEANING OF UGLINESS.*

By C. HUBERT H. PARRY.

Ugliness is a disagreeable word, but we do not, therefore, consider it unfit to be discussed. It is only people who have given up being personally alive who avoid things because they are disagreeable. To people who have any fund of energy they are rather inviting than otherwise, as they are apt to arouse the combative instincts; and liberal minds also feel that all progress is made by facing things which are disagreeable and finding out what they really mean, and accepting them if they can be of service. Every advance in Art has been made by accepting something which has been condemned as ugly by recognized artistic authorities. It is not so very long ago that such simple things as major thirds and major sixths were regarded as unpleasant. It was in quite recent times that many unprepared discords were thought so venomously ugly that the wildest revolutionary would hardly venture to use the mildest of them. It was not long ago that augmented fourths were regarded as so offensive that they were commonly associated with the father of lies; and now we even have proposals to abolish the subtly elastic and varied scale which grew up in the course of centuries, and substitute a scale of fewer notes which consists mainly of an artificial monotony of these very intervals. It was even in more recent times that consecutive fifths were regarded as so ugly that a self-respecting composer suffered tortures of shame if he had used them inadvertently—and consecutive seconds and sevenths were regarded as so vile as to be almost unthinkable. Yet all these things are now among the most familiar features of our daily musical life. When people came to realise that so many things that were once held offensive had come to be accepted as time went on, it was not far to go to infer that ugliness was desirable for itself. Such a discovery was a great encouragement to the spirit of adventure; and the lookers-on were provided with novel experiences very cheaply; while at the same time they assured themselves that inasmuch as all the greatest and most individual composers had been violently abused in their lifetime for breaking supposed rules, therefore everyone who breaks rules must be a great and courageous genius; and so in latter days it comes about that it requires more courage and firmness not to break rules than to break them.

There probably has never been any time in history when men have so ostentatiously and eagerly broken rules wholesale as the present; and there never was a time when the breaking of rules was so welcomed and so likely to win public favour. Indeed, a large part of the every-day public has been led to believe that not breaking rules is a proof of ineptitude. We may sympathise cordially with the impulse of aspiring youth to break rules. It is most natural and healthy to feel an ungovernable impulse to do anything which one is dogmatically told not to do. In fact, if rules were not broken there would not be any progress in either social things or artistic things; and we should be buried mountains deep in huge piles of dead conventions. But it so happens that humanity works in the same fashion as the laws of nature. When something has to be effected it does it so wholesale that it cannot do good in any one direction without doing harm somewhere else. The advance is merely the balance between the good actually achieved and some inevitable evils which result from humanity's having overlooked something which was entailed in the operations for the desired end. This is very clearly illustrated in the present situation in connection with ugliness; and it is desirable to get behind the merely superficial appearances and distinguish between the objections to them which are futile and those that are well grounded.

People are always finding out that things reputed ugly prove not to be so on better acquaintance. But what does this better acquaintance consist of? The truth obviously is that many things which appear ugly only do so because they are not understood. It is by their context men shall know them—the truth of their relation to their surroundings. It must occur to people who think about such things that they have often had the experience of genuinely new music which has repelled them at first because so much of it seemed positively ugly—and that when they knew it better and got more into touch with it, what appeared to be offensive in the ugliness passed away, and the ugliness became among the most welcome features in the works implicated—because they were the proofs of original invention and thought. The composer has in such a case shown us something we did not know before. He has enhanced our range of artistic perception and added to the interest of existence. And what we thought to be uglinesses prove themselves to be the pledges of the service the composer has done us. And precisely the same experience must have happened to readers of really genuine poetry.

The test of the value of a man's work is whether it really enlarges the lives of his fellow men and makes them more worth living. Judged from this standpoint ugliness would seem to be one of the most beneficent provisions of nature. It is an incitement to attention, to grapple with something that may reward thinking about. The complacency of a work which sedulously avoids everything that might be described as ugly is soporific and soothing, but it does not enlarge men's lives much. It only ministers to the feeling of being comfortable. It is much better to realise that ugliness can be compatible with beauty; and that things which may appear ugly from one point of view may be beautiful from another.

But if we acknowledge that things are generally ugly only because we do not understand them, it is still possible that there may be things which are not only apparently ugly, but really so—that there are uglinesses which are positive and not merely contingent.

And in this connection it is as well to point out that it is not the least use trying to force meanings on words which are not in common acceptance.

Philosophers who devote themselves, as a preliminary, to trying to induce people to understand that they use words in their wrong significances, too often have to have monuments put up to commemorate works which they have not had time to begin.

It is not worth while to discuss the aptness or cogency of the term 'ugliness' as it is commonly used in disparagement of works of art which are not agreeable to the persons who use the word. We can possibly see our way without that.

But we must recognize that there are several ways of classifying uglinesses. And one of them is into ugliness of the letter and ugliness of the spirit—Ugliness in the manner of saying and in the thing said. And in this connection we must recall that music has changed its character and sphere comparatively recently. As long as it was a self-contained Art which had no reference to things divine or human outside itself, the range of discords and intervals of melody and of harmonic progressions was very limited, and anything which transgressed certain well-known conventions was ruled out as ugly and unbecoming. But when music became more and more the interpreter of human emotions, and of feeling and passion and of human dramatic situations, men could not do without a vast number of dissonances and jarring passages which seemed essential to the adequate expression of such things. Of such liberty Monteverde was the pioneer: and showed his determination, in his younger and more venturesome days, not to be debarred from using anything, however harsh and ungainly, which seemed appropriate and necessary to his purposes, and his pupil Cavalli followed in his steps. But after a while this venturesomeness was set back for a considerable time by the attitude of the complacent patrons of Opera, who did not want truthful interpretations of moving human situations, but merely pleasant entertainments; and composers gave up that kind of liberty because they wanted profitable patronage and not Art. It was in a quarter not patronized by such folk that the expansion of Art in the direction of wholesome and fruitful ugliness was sought; and of such expansion John Sebastian Bach was the greatest prototype. None of the conventional prohibitions concerned him in the least. But he did not seek ugliness for itself, nor for any base motive, but pointed out by implication that most of the things which were debarred on the grounds of ugliness were not ugly at all in a disagreeable sense, but only ugly when they were not understood. The result was natural. A few people who were under the spell of his astonishing artistic personality more or less felt the rightness of his attitude. But as soon as he was gone the world dispensed with him. No one dared to follow in his steps for nearly a hundred years, and it is only in quite recent times that men have grown to understand and find that his venturesomeness was amply justified. Here again the feeling of ugliness which people thought they suffered from, was merely the result of not understanding. It is very suggestive that this pause should have taken place twice—once after Monteverde and once after J. S. Bach. And the reason chimes with our thesis. For it obviously was that the human mind was as yet insufficiently developed to understand what seemed to be ugly. In Bach's case too it was the composer who had the greatest depth of feeling and the widest scope of expression who was considered to be a dry, mechanical, bewigged old speculator in futile and unprofitable ingenuities. But long afterwards men found out better, and became more and more thankful for the things which had appeared ugly through lack of understanding; and which enlarged their lives and the possibilities of artistic experience when they got to understand. The expanded field, which the relation to things human afforded, gave room to justify many things which would have seemed and indeed really been ugly in abstract Art. And Bach's attitude illuminates all the tendencies of Art in the romantic period, and all the wild developments which followed its comparatively tranquil initiatives. Men say now that you cannot debar anything which expresses the subject the composer has in his mind. But in reality it is only a change of plane. Though nothing may be illegitimate as far as the letter is concerned, there may be much that is objectionable in the purpose for which it is used and the spirit which is expressed by it. There are things which offend physically and things that offend spiritually. The things which offend physically can pass away, but not the offences which come from falseness of intention or inadequacy of execution.

If we are not prepared to condemn Monteverde and Purcell and Bach for doing ugly things, the plea that things are inadmissible merely because they are ugly seems to break down. And people may argue that the same applies to the ugliness of our own time. But then comes the question, are not Monteverde and Purcell and Bach sometimes intrinsically ugly? And if we find it is so, the same may be likely with some of our own wild and heedless experiments. Monteverde and Purcell and Bach suffered from the lack of artistic methods in some directions, and they committed the same kind of uglinesses that composers commit in the present day when they speculate beyond the range of what they are sure of, and do things which are out of gear with the standard of their Art. Bach sometimes committed uglinesses when he persisted in treating the human voice as an instrument, and gave it things to do that were so nearly impracticable as to cause pain to those who witness the efforts of singers to cope with them. He committed ugliness when for lack of consideration he made certain aggressive instruments go on sounding in an accompaniment till they cause positive pain to the hearers. But he rarely committed uglinesses in instrumental music, because he was more sure of his ground. And in such examples we find a clue.

Some fortunate person hit upon the happy definition of dirt as matter in the wrong place. It seems likely enough that really repulsive ugliness is of the same nature as dirt. It is artistic matter in the wrong place. We should realise this directly for ourselves, if any of us who had any sense of style heard Palestrina's, or Vittoria's, or Marenzio's, or Orlando Gibbons's music amplified by modern unprepared discords and chromatic passages to bring them within the comprehension of those who have no artistic intelligence. We should feel it if we heard Mozart's Symphonies brought up to date with combinations of alien tonalities, and simultaneous sounding of major and minor chords. We should feel it if Beethoven's Symphonies were brought up to date and amplified in a manner which would throw the exquisite balance and proportion of his greatest works utterly out of gear. The attitude of mind which is induced in hearers who are worthy of great masterpieces of the past when they submit themselves to their spell, would cause them to regard as offensively hideous the things which would be inconceivable to the minds which produced those masterpieces. The things which would have seemed ugly to the composers themselves would for the time being seem ugly and offensive also to them. And attempts to make great works of Art palatable to people who have no artistic understanding and no sense of elevation or greatness by introducing popular treatment, similarly destroys the finer aspects which appeal to the initiated, and makes the manipulations objectionable. It is a question of style, and of the influences which corrupt it.

The reason why the atrocities of style are becoming more and more universal and aggressive is, that commercialism and the desire for being taken notice of, try to accommodate artistic products to the largest number. The mental training of the largest number has not been such as to qualify them to distinguish the finest qualities of Art. Therefore the commercial object is to modify artistic products so as to attract promiscuous and indiscriminate appetites. And the question is—How do they do it? Commercial dealers in Art and their accomplices cannot modify Art-products by higher artistic processes. It is not in their province or in their capacity. There is no alternative then. All the modifications which commercial influence makes in Art-work is in the direction of shams.

Some of us may remember Ruskin's violent attack upon what is called wood-graining. Wood-graining is the painting of one kind of wood to make it look like another. It is the fruit of entire artistic incapacity and of the desire for cheapness—a purely commercial device. As Ruskin pointed out, all woods have their own ways of being effective in domestic architecture, and their own possibilities of treatment. And the lack of artistic sense which shirks the simple artistic problem for cheapness attains results which are merely ugly and offensive.

But this is only a type of the universal shams of commercial Art-supply; and there are many thousands of ways in which it is manifested in all arts whether of domestic furniture, architecture, paintings, sculpture or music. They pass muster as long as they are not understood, but as soon as they are understood they become repulsive. So there comes to be a new classification of ugliness—into those which cease to be offensive when they are understood, and those which become more and more offensive the better they are understood. The first kind becomes more and more welcome the better it is known, and the latter the more detestable. The enormous expansion of methods and resources of Art in the past quarter-of-a-century has increased the possibilities of trespass in the range of ugliness. And we must look for the solution of the problem in the spirit in which the thing which strikes us as ugly is used.

If a man uses what at first sight seems an ugliness with obviously sincere and wholesome intention, his sincerity may make his ugliness not only pardonable but attractive—like the clumsinesses of some speaker whose mind is full of matter and who cannot get it out without a struggle. It becomes part of his personality. He does not use ugliness to attract attention or get an advertisement, but because he cannot get what he has in his mind said without.

But if he pours out insane uproar all about nothing, and purposely scarifies men's minds with violent, aggressive, or senseless procedures, and seeks out noises which have the sense and offensiveness of foul odours in order to get notice taken of himself, or notoriety, or mere profit, the uglinesses are manifestly in the wrong place, and are therefore offensive. They are in the wrong place when they are not put where they are with artistic intention, but on a baser impulse.

But these things are only to be discovered by development of understanding—and development of understanding is the business of education. And education has various phases, and some of them are not favourable to the development of understanding of things in general, but only of things within a limited range.

Owing to practical needs education of late tends to specialization; and even to specialization within specialization. And the danger of specialization is to narrow the outlook. Every specialist knows what is false and bad and cheap in his own branch, but is often at a loss in any other department. And the risk is accentuated by the fact that it is the easiest part of education to teach individual special subjects, and the most difficult and much the most important part is to develop the mind and the perception of relations. A man may be a very good specialist and a very bad judge of anything outside his own subject. And the effect of too much concentration being bestowed upon details is to produce an attitude of mind which is altogether unfavourable to Art and poetry and literature of a high order. Because Art is the perception of relations, and greatness in these things consists essentially in inviting the recognition of the thousands of different aspects in which things may appear, and the manifold human associations which are called up by the skill of the poet or musician; by forms of melody, types of harmonic progression, by phraseology and colour, and even some phases of form and method. One of the most ominous features of the present phase of democracy is that so many people who belong to the classes which till now have had no outlook beyond the bare struggle for existence are incapable of coming into touch with the range of thought which is a necessary foundation of real greatness. Many things which should afford suggestions of emotional phases of centuries of preceding generations of human beings, leave them quite blank. The door has not been opened; and, unfortunately, mere specialization tends to keep it even more firmly shut. Attention can only be attracted by cheap devices such as make physical appeals, by startling explosions, and violent and aggressive effects of harmony. The mind is led to welcome the wrong kinds of ugliness, not those which may be dispelled by intelligence, but such as can be accepted by habit.

On the other hand, it must not be forgotten that splendid service is being done by the ardour for abolishing worn-out conventions, the dead obstructive matter which is worse than mere ugliness. Art progresses by the elimination of such obstructions; but the great progressive movements always have curious effects which are characteristic and suggestive; and the effect of the breaking up of conventions in recent times is quaintly appropriate. For anyone can discern that enormous numbers of people with limited understanding of Art take great delight in mere iridescence. And the connection of iridescence with the breaking up of anything is obviously very apt. For iridescence is generally the result of decomposition—and decomposition is generally accompanied by a good deal of gas. There is undeniably an enormous amount of gas about nowadays, and people who are only concerned with Art in a superficial manner have apparently lost sight of the fact that gas, even when used as an illuminant, is not the best method of illumination. It is not nearly so pure as the kinds of light which have more atmospheric origin—and it has a way of leaving dirt behind it—which is ugly. The gas which results from decomposition is not even useful for illumination. It is only a natural concomitant of iridescence, and attracts the undeveloped mind because it constantly suggests novelty. But it also follows from the inevitable conditions of things that such novelties are quickly evanescent. The great consolation in all the bewilderments of conditions which seem antagonistic to art, literature and drama is that things which are solid, sound and genuine, have lasting qualities, and the artificial uglinesses which are merely devised for unworthy purposes, and to attract the attention of crude and undeveloped minds, either rapidly disintegrate or become even more hopelessly conventional than the conventions which were, at least originally, founded on a reasonable basis. The end of the matter is that the uglinesses which are objectionable are such as are false in intention, the make-shifts of incapacity, the fruits of misconceptions and of purposes not genuinely artistic. They are matter in the wrong place, because their relation to their context adds nothing to their significance.

But there are uglinesses which are infinitely significant. Such delightful uglinesses and irregularities as express honestly the personalities of the men who produce them—uglinesses without which all the savour of Art would be gone. And these uglinesses are like the bacilli which exterminate the poisonous bacilli. For it is by the sincerity of personality, which expresses itself honestly in such uglinesses, that the noisome pretence of ugliness with a base motive at the bottom of it gets expelled from the scheme of things Musical.

No doubt this sounds rather like an invitation to men to seek out uglinesses and make them wilfully. But if they were sought out they would be false. The situation clears itself. The attempt to be ugly merely for the sake of being ugly would at once make the ugliness offensive. It would show either a lack of understanding or of honesty. And the lack of either of them is sufficient to prevent such uglinesses being among those that are welcome.

The presence of the offensive kinds of ugliness in Art is the penalty society pays for treating Art as negligible. It is the fruit of lack of understanding. Whatever people who are devoid of artistic sense may say, mankind cannot do without Art; and it often takes its revenge remorselessly for being slighted.

Mankind is mirrored in his Arts in his baser as well as his finer qualities. The uglinesses which represent fine qualities are welcome, and the uglinesses which represent incompetence, insincerity, stupidity, cunning, greediness, narrow-mindedness, and such unfortunate obliquities reveal to us things we could very willingly do without—though we are quite aware that we never shall.

A RUSSIAN COMPOSER OF TO-DAY:

IGOR STRAVINSKY.

By M.-D. CALVOCORESSI.

Igor Stravinsky is one of the youngest, but also the best, representatives of the actual Russian School whose vicissitudes have of late been so many and so confusing.

As soon as one studies the evolution of Russian music, one cannot help being struck by the fact that after a period of rapid progress—during which a few masters like Glinka, Borodin, Moussorgsky, Balakirev, Rimsky-Korsakov displayed surprising originality and, creating a style entirely their own, endowed musical art with new resources, new objects, and new vitality—came a period of reaction, due mostly to foreign influences; so that for a time it seemed that the School was fated to enjoy only the brief period of splendour for which it stood indebted to the few masters named (and accessorially to a few minor artists who more or less followed their lead), and thenceforth to comprise, according to Mr. César Cui's nice distinction, 'not properly Russian composers, but composers who were Russian.'

Without opening the vexed question of nationalism versus universalism in music, one may briefly aver that such a reaction was ominous, for the simple reason that the nationalist composers alone had created beautiful works and opened new paths; and it appeared deplorable to all lovers of Russian music that the younger men should have been led astray by a sort of self-consciousness and the false shame of remaining true Russians instead of adhering to the tenets of western (and in the particular case mostly German) conventions.

Mr. Stravinsky's chief merit is that he remains free from this dangerous prejudice. Russian born<sup>1</sup> and Russian in spirit, he has no ambition but to assert his personality in the fullest and most independent way. He has eagerly drunk-in the often misunderstood or forgotten message of Russia's greatest masters, and thereby learned to stand his own ground, exactly as they had done, and to a great extent by the same means. He has undergone no foreign influence, except perhaps to a slight extent that of the modern French 'impressionist' School—itself much influenced by the more progressive Russian musicians, like Borodin and Moussorgsky.* I would not venture to say that he is at present the only young Russian composer who shows himself not an imitator, but a continuator of the chiefs of the nationalist School; but assuredly he stands apart among his colleagues for the abundance, boldness and vigour of his imagination as well as for his command of craftsmanship; his originality is greater and at the same time more typical: he is the only one who has achieved more than mere attempts to promote Russia's true musical spirit and style.

Igor Feodorovitch Stravinsky, born June 5 (17), 1882, at Oranienbaum, near St. Petersburg, is the son of a singer whose renderings of the principal bass parts in Glinka's, Moussorgsky's, and Rimsky-Korsakov's operas remain justly famous. He studied composition as a private pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov, but almost from the beginning showed himself far less conservatively minded than his master, who always was at great pains to reconcile freedom of fancy with sedulous discipline in diction, and thereby diverged more and more from the uncompromising leaders, Moussorgsky and Borodin. As far as brilliancy and love of the picturesque is concerned, Stravinsky remains the true disciple of Rimsky-Korsakov; but the details of his style show how deeply he has been impressed by works like Moussorgsky's songs and 'Boris Goudounov' or Borodin's symphonies. Rimsky-Korsakov appears to have found his young pupil's independence and daring rather startling, but not repellent; and when he heard for the first time the music of 'The Bird of fire' he is said to have tersely given vent to his feelings in this sentence; 'Look here, stop playing this horrid thing, otherwise I might begin to enjoy it.'

Mr. Stravinsky's first work—a work full of promise—is a Symphony in E flat major, finished in 1906. In 1907 appeared his 'Fantastic Scherzo' for orchestra, in 1908 'Fireworks,' a short and very effective tone-sketch, and towards the end of the same year his 'Funereal Song' in memory of Rimsky-Korsakov. All three works are characteristic, and show Stravinsky's personality as almost as fully developed as in the beautiful score of 'The Bird of fire,' which is, however, more remarkable for variety and power. It remains mostly picturesque, as befits the musical setting of a mere fairy-tale; but under its brilliant display of fancy, is informed with a deep and poetic feeling that appeals not only to our taste for the weird and to our sense of physical pleasure, but also to our higher emotional faculties. One might compare it, in that respect, to Rimsky-Korsakov's best fantastic works, like 'Mlada.'

* On this question see New Music Review, March, 1911: 'Conservatism and Progress in Russian Music.'—By M.-D. Calvocoressi.

'Petrushka,' finished last winter, is in altogether different a vein. It consists of realistic scenes from everyday life in Russia, and describes the adventures of Petrushka (a popular type akin to Pierrot or Harlequin) during carnival. The composer has been inspired by the subject to write brisk, humorous, and racy music, at times purposely crude and garish, but full of life, and, though nowise resembling his former works except in freeness of imagination and effectiveness of scoring, no less intensely original and delightful.

'Petrushka' may be said to be unique among the musical works produced in Russia to this day; but its descent will unhesitatingly be acknowledged by anyone acquainted with Moussorgsky's comic and familiar scenes.

Stravinsky's other works comprise some early Etudes for pianoforte, a few songs (of which an English translation is preparing), and an opera, the book of which is founded on Andersen's 'Nightingale.'

THE NEW 'WAGNER-LISZT.'

By WILLIAM ASHTON ELLIS.

Alas, it is only in the German at present, but at length we are given what will come as a considerable surprise to most readers, to wit, an entirely new and greatly amplified edition of the first of all the collections of R. Wagner's letters, his illuminating correspondence with Franz Liszt, originally published in the winter 1887-88. There had been a second German edition some ten years back, adding a mere quartet of epistles unearthed in the interval, but otherwise identical with the first. But this third edition is tantamount to a wholly fresh work, there being very few pages, particularly in the second volume (1854 to 1882—now), not marked by restorations varying in importance from the substitution of a proper name for the earlier 'X' to an entire long paragraph, or even an integral 'new' letter, hitherto withheld. To do full justice to these most interesting additions, would be quite impossible within the limits imposed by any periodical; but a few such trouvailles certainly ought to be selected at once from the abundant store. Where to begin and what to choose, is the principal difficulty; so I must be forgiven if my choice might be bettered. Let me commence, then, with that extraordinary offer from the Duke of Coburg (Ernst II., brother of our at that time Prince Consort), of which the previous editions of this correspondence had afforded but a passing enigmatic hint.

In my fourth volume of the 'Life of Wagner,' I already was able to draw upon a letter from the Duke to Liszt of February 20, 1853, asking him to 'act as intermediary between myself and Kapellmeister Wagner,' with a view to the latter's 'fitting instrumentation' to the Duke's fourth opera. But at that time I was obliged to leave the subject of this offer with the remark: 'That it was declined, almost goes without saying; unfortunately, however, we are again faced with a gap in the Wagner-Liszt letters.' To-day that 'gap' is amply filled, all three of the then-lacking documents being shown us at last, though we shall find the first and second to be simply old friends with new faces.

A substantial omission in the earlier-published form of Liszt's letter to Wagner of February 26, 1853, is at last made good as follows:

And now, dearest friend, I have a very delicate, fateful question to put to you. I will do it without any beating of the bush, albeit I have hesitated several days already. After mature consideration of various circumstances, however, which I do not need to detail, it has become my duty to ask you whether you would care to declare yourself ready to instrument the next three-act opera of the Duke of Coburg's? It is self-understood that the matter will be kept entirely secret between now and the opera's performance.

The Duke, whom I visited again at Gotha the day before yesterday, is very well-disposed towards you; and in case you give me no refusal, he is certain to enter into correspondence with you very soon. You may imagine that if he had not commissioned me in the most definite manner to make you this proposal (he even spoke of the fee—between five and eight hundred thaler—&c.), I should never have come by the idea. I told him of your highly ailing health, and your intention to compose the 'Nibelungen,'* which will lay claim to the whole of your time. But he was of opinion that his proposition would not greatly surprise you, as he had spoken to you about something similar in earlier years [1849?]. So far as I could make out, he is not disinclined to call you to Gotha, and appoint you nolens volens Capellmeister there. Naturally all this is quite between ourselves, and I must entreat you to let nobody hear of it, or I might easily get compromised in consequence. So please give me a circumstantial and diplomatic reply (such as I can forward to the Duke) to a question I have put to you by his express desire and command. The other points, such as your summoning to Gotha, &c., at which I have just hinted, of course you will not touch on in this first letter. Do not ask me, either, in what sense I should advise you, pro or con, let it suffice that I undertook to communicate this proposition to you.

If possible, please forward me the letter destined for the Duke's eyes at once—or, if you prefer it, write direct to the Duke (one styles him Royal Highness) and send me the letter unsealed. The Duke is of an impatient nature, and fonder of letting people wait than of waiting himself! One might perhaps screw up the fee to 1,000 thaler [ca. £150].

In course of a letter dated March 3, 1853, the main contents of which are devoted in the older editions to the plan Wagner then was hatching for a concert to consist of excerpts from his operas to date—fulfilled the next 18th, 20th, and 22nd of May—the new edition of the correspondence at length supplies the composer's preliminary answer to the above :

To-morrow I'll write you—at due peace and leisure—that 'diplomatic' letter. You shall be satisfied with it in every respect ; although I assure you it costs me a little self-mastery to place myself on the right standpoint to consider the Duke's offer, not as thoughtlessly and painfully insulting, but as well-meant at bottom—which no doubt it is in truth—even if impossible under any circumstances to accept. It forcibly reminds me of the time, just 13 years ago, when I arranged Donizetti's 'Favorite' for two cornets-à-piston for Schlesinger in Paris ; it's to be hoped I have earned thus much from the world now, that it won't expect of me a similar disgrace—for money. However, there shall not be a trace of this bitterness, as said, to read in my to-morrow's letter ; for when I think the matter well over, the Duke's offer makes him appear to me nothing but a very good-natured person, generous and unprejudiced in his way, if also a little vain and amateur-like inconsiderate. But I've got a bit fatter than that with the Weimar princes by now, friend, don't you think ?

At which point we return to already-known matter, though with another tiny restoration at the letter's extreme end :

To-morrow you shall see me in Court uniform again !

'To-morrow' duly brings that 'Court uniform,' in the shape of an entirely 'new' letter. But it is enclosed in that old one of March 4 which, docked of its initial paragraph, had hitherto swung loose in the air. So we will take the restored private opening first :

For yourself I—

My dearest Friend, here you have the 'diplomatic' letter. If I could describe to you the peculiar, deeply painful and bitter mood in which I find myself, you'd admire me for this 'diplomatic' letter. Were I to keep more company with all sorts of people, perhaps I should also be more superficial in my judgment of their dealings ; but my nature being as it is, I can't do otherwise than take everything that happens to me in its innermost and most radical significance ; and, measured that way, the opera-writing reigning Duke of Coburg, with his engaging me to instrument his trash, comes out of it very badly ! In my mind's eye I can see myself his Capellmeister ! (For this I broke with God and all the world, to end by collaborating with Frau Charlotte Birschpfeifer in the fabrication of ducal operas at a Coburg palace !) Admit it, these gentry have all become Jews ! From your letter, dearest friend, I perceive you have humour enough to enter into my feelings on this point as well ; so let us take it easy.

The letter of the same date enclosed with the above, and 'destined for the Duke's eyes,' is completely new to us :

Most valued Friend,—The proposal of the Duke of Coburg to get his next operatic composition instrumented by myself has much surprised me. Since the offer of a substantial sum as fee for the labour demanded is attached to it, and I may reasonably assume that it would be very easy for his R.H. to obtain for that task a still more noted master of the art, instead of me, I surely am not mistaken if I believe that this proposal issues in the first place from the gracious wish to let me have an acceptable assistance in my present situation. How agreeably attuned I must feel to hearty thanks by this very natural assumption, you, best friend, will easily judge : it vividly reminded me at once of the action, only brought to my knowledge the other day, of a former Duke of Augustenburg, who, when Schiller was ailing and reduced to scant resources, assigned him a considerable annuity for three whole years, unasked, for the fortifying of his health and to enable him to devote himself to art and science in good spirits. The task proposed by his R.H. in return for his proffered assistance is in any case of such a nature that, leaving entirely out of count the interest it might awake in itself, it would not take an excessive toll of time from the man entrusted with it, supposing him to be in full and facile possession of his working power ; and it is certain that his R.H. was of no other opinion when I was thought of for it. Unfortunately, however, here I touch precisely the point that makes me thoroughly incapable of serving the Duke according to his wish.

Only these last few days I have been busy arranging a few pieces from my operas for a concert performance. Obligated to add a page of scoring here and there for this purpose, to my great distress I have discovered how much this kind of labour taxes me. Since in my present state of health I cannot occupy myself continuously with any work—so that after two hours' writing I have to give it up completely for the greater part of the day—this latest experience of the degree to which full-scoring fatigues me has imbued me with the extremely mournful idea of how much time I doubtless should require to carry out my 'Nibelungen' scores some day ! With a heavy sigh I had to tell myself that I could not think of the possibility of finishing—nay, even of embarking on—those great labours, unless I were entirely free from any tie to time, never found myself driven in the very slightest, and could dispose of an adequate leisure. It is possible that my condition may improve again ; only, I am afraid I need more inspiring impressions of life for my whole nervous system, than I can ever hope for in my situation. As for taking up a labour such as the Duke now suggests to me, I cannot think of it at all ; with my anxiety regarding the strict task of my life—the execution of my 'Nibelungen' scores—not only would it profoundly depress me morally, but, in view of the necessity of observing a certain given term for the completion of that score [the Duke's], it also would physically bring me to total grief.

Consequently it is no question of wanting or not wanting to, but simply of declaring that I feel quite incapable now, in every respect, of complying with the Duke's gracious request. I must therefore beg you, my best friend, faithfully to inform H.R.H. of the exact state of affairs here set forth, and above all, not to forget to express my thanks for the benevolent and beneficent sentiment I assume on the part of the artistic Duke.

With most faithful and grateful attachment,

I remain, Your eternally obliged

Zurich, 4 March 1853.

RICHARD WAGNER.

As we knew from the older editions, though it was not there made clear in what regard, Liszt replied on the 25th :

I sent your letter on to the D. of C. He answers in quite a kind and amiable fashion. In conclusion he adds : 'On verra ce qu'on pourra faire pour lui plus tard,' concerning which I shall not fail to speak with the D. on occasion. Of course you haven't the smallest doubt as to my own manner of thinking in this affair ; otherwise I should have to consider you—forgive the word, most precious friend—an owl gone silly. In truth you could not have regarded the matter in any other light than you have ; and just for that reason was I compelled to show myself entirely passive and neutral.

To make our anecdote complete, the new edition now presents us with that letter from the Duke itself—rather a choice specimen of the 'amateur-like inconsiderate' :

Returning you the ominous letter, I infinitely regret seeing a negotiation broken off, from whose result I had promised myself much. Decidedly Wagner is morally and physically ill, and the task proposed to him too sterile and thankless for his talent, accustomed to a higher flight. Upon closer consideration, and after completion of the second act [presumably Santa Chiara], I now must entertain a doubt myself whether, even if he had possessed the will and strength to undertake the work, Wagner would have been in the position to follow the pianoforte-score fairly faithfully, without turning it all topsy-turvy. However, with Lafontaine you will tell me 'The grapes are sour.'

So I shall try to stand on my own feet, and when an act is finished as to instrumentation also, submit it to your expert opinion. Upon that it shall then depend whether we look about for some outsider.

Accept my heartiest thanks for your endeavours. Give my greeting to Wagner when you write him, and say that I wish him a speedy recovery. On verra plus tard ce que l'on pourra faire pour lui. You understand me.

In constant good-will,

Yours,

Gotha, the 17th March, 1853.

ERNST.

As epilogue to which cheerful diagnosis of the unstooping vine's condition, we now have a scrap of replacement in Liszt's letter to Wagner himself of April 8:

There is nothing to be expected or asked from the D. of C. for the moment. I was at Gotha a week back, to hear 'Casilda,' for which the D. had most kindly invited me. He assumes that you are mentally and physically ill; which I naturally did not dispute.

Other topics of interest in the redintegration must be reserved for a subsequent article.

SIR FREDERIC H. COWEN.

In our July issue we were able to comment only briefly on the news that Frederic Hymen Cowen had received the distinguished honour of knighthood. He was the only musician thus favoured on the occasion of the Coronation. This recognition of long, arduous and eminently useful service in the cause of music was as gratifying to the musical profession generally as it was to the recipient.

In November, 1898, we gave a portrait and sketch of the career of Sir Frederic. It is now meet that the list of his compositions since that period should be given, and that other particulars of his artistic life should be recorded.

COMPOSITIONS SINCE 1898.

ORCHESTRAL.

- Overture, 'The Butterfly's Ball' (1900).
- 'Phantasy of Life and Love' (1901).
- 'Indian Rhapsody' (1903).
- 'Four Old English Dances' (second set) (1905).

ORATORIOS, CANTATAS, ETC.

- 'Coronation Ode' (1902).
- 'John Gilpin' (Cardiff, 1904).
- 'He giveth His beloved sleep' (Cardiff, 1907).
- 'The Veil' (Cardiff, 1910).

Besides services, anthems and part-songs, duets, &c., he has composed about 300 songs.

APPOINTMENTS.

Conductor, Hallé Concerts in Manchester (1898) (for three seasons); Liverpool Philharmonic Society (1898) (which he still holds); Bradford Festival Choral Society (1898) (which he still holds); London Philharmonic Society (1888 to 1892, and again from 1900 to 1907); Scottish Orchestra (1900 to 1910); Handel Festival Crystal Palace, (1903, 1906 and 1909); Cardiff Festival (1902, 1904, 1907 and 1910); Scarborough Festival (1899, 1902).

Received the honorary degree of Mus. Doc. from Cambridge University, 1900, and also from Edinburgh, 1910.

The facts as regards the Mendelssohn Scholarship, referred to on p. 715 of 1898 volume, are that Cowen went up for examination and was told that he certainly should have had it if his parents had not wished to keep their control over him.

Undoubtedly his most important recent composition is the oratorio 'The Veil,' which was produced, as stated above, at the Cardiff Festival of 1910. It was to have been performed at Queen's Hall this season, but owing to Sir Frederic's regrettable illness, now happily past, the production was postponed.

Performances of 'The Veil' are already arranged for next winter in London, Liverpool (Philharmonic), Bradford, Leeds, Sheffield, Newcastle, Bath, and Cardiff. Others are also contemplated.

Occasional Notes.

JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH.
(1685-1750.)

Not Alpine!—Himalayan is the range
Of thy stupendous voice. Through every clime
Of passion mounting, where the mists of Time
Girdle unconquered heights, above all change
Of seasons, thou dost fling to Heaven thy strange Prodigious harmonies, that grandly chime
In pauses of the storm of sound, sublime
As thunder of descending avalanche.

Thine are the giant leaps, o'er monstrous chasms,
From ledge to ledge; depths of abysmal gloom;
Rending of ancient rocks by lightning-spasms.
Thine too the gently-sloping vales, where loom
Soft forms, the rainbow weaves her frail phantasms,
Butterflies toy, and fairy flowers bloom.

Alfred Hayes

In the American Etude there is a translation of an article by M. Camille Saint-Saëns, on 'Anarchy in music,' that appeared in Le Courrier Musical. After describing the growth of polyphony up to the period of Palestrina, he makes a protest against the recent reprints which give directions for expression not called for by the style. He says:

A few well-meaning, erudite persons have attempted to bring this music into line with the music of to-day, and one is surprised to find passages marked molto espressivo, which appears somewhat bold. Entirely consonant music in which the interval of a fourth was held to be strongly dissonant, and the diminished fifth was regarded as the diabolus in musica, ought to be, by its very nature, opposed to expressiveness.

He states that Fétis made a masterly study of the evolution or harmony up to his time, but he did not foresee a system of free tonality, although he demanded the suppression of all rules and constraint:

Every one should make rules for himself; music is free and unlimited in its possibilities; there are no perfect chords; there are no such things as discords nor false harmonies; any aggregation of notes is lawful.

M. Saint-Saëns bitterly goes on to say:

What then are we to seek for? The development of the sensibility. According to this theory, he whose sensibility is properly developed is not he who, in tasting wine, can give you the growth and the vintage year. It is he who partakes with equal tolerance of heavy wine or light, whisky or brandy, preferring that which most burns his throat.

It is not he who, in judging a picture, appreciates the delicate touches by means of which the different tones blend with each other, but he who brutally brings together vermilion and Verona green, as one sees at the exhibition in autumn. It is not he who, in music, appreciates ingeniously contrived changes of tonality, giving the theme new and undreamt of significance, as the great Richard does all through the score of 'Die Meistersinger'; it is he who, being at home in all tonalities, unceasingly piles up dissonances never prepared and never resolved, snorting his way through the musical field like a wild boar in a flower garden.

And he adds, sarcastically :

Ah, well, one can go even further than that ! Why stop at the voice in the unlimited field available ? Why stay in one scale ? Infinite possibilities are at our disposal ; let us profit by the fact. Let us make use of the dogs barking at the moon, and cats mewling, and the birds singing . . . One marvels in some respects at the progress accomplished during the last thirty years ; it is thus one should consider the architects of the fifteenth century. They did not see that in killing the pointed arch they threw us back for centuries into the arms of the Greeks and Romans.

The Philharmonic Society will celebrate its Centenary in the year 1912, and a special invitation to compose a work for production during the season has been issued to each of the following composers : Mr. Granville Bantock, Sir Frederic Coven, Dr. Walford Davies, Sir Edward Elgar, Mr. Edward German, Sir A. C. Mackenzie, Sir Hubert Parry, Mr. Landon Ronald, and Sir Charles Villiers Stanford. It is understood that the invitations have in every case been cordially accepted.

Manchester is deservedly proud of its older musical institutions like the Gentlemen's Concerts, at one of which the present President, Mr. Broadfield, smilingly says Prince Charlie is reputed to have been present. A timely article in the Manchester City News reminds us of another debt owed to pioneer workers. Mr. T. H. McCormick relates how, in 1841, in a building on the adjoining sites of the present Theatre Royal and Free Trade Hall, a Mr. Hawes Hargreaves bequeathed the residue of his property to trustees, who, after his death, were to appropriate every article of his pertaining to music and then to establish a choral society for which he left funds. Members flocked to the concerts, artists such as Thalberg, Staudigl, Marras, Lablache, Lockey, John L. Hatton and many others appeared. Flushed with initial success the committee responsible endeavoured to float a company to build a big hall more suitable to their requirements, but insufficient capital being forthcoming, the project was abandoned. This was before Sir Charles Hallé's day, and it is interesting to learn that at one of these 'Hargreaves' concerts Mendelssohn conducted his 'Elijah' only eight months after the Birmingham 'first time' performance.

The programmes of these concerts, six per season, were annotated with excellent historical and critical remarks. There would appear to have been a regular Mendelssohn craze, for 'St. Paul,' 'Lobgesang,' 'Walpurgis Night,' 'Antigone,' and music to a 'Midsummer night's Dream' were all performed. And all this, be it remembered, was before the memorable Arts Treasures Exhibition of 1857, whence came the nucleus of the famous Hallé Orchestra. Mr. Charles Hallé, along with the great Thalberg, appeared as a solo pianist at these concerts, playing in Beethoven's 'Choral Fantasia' and some of the 'Lieder ohne Worte.' But a violent dislike for the early Free Trade Hall as a suitable concert room led to the dissolution of the Society after nine seasons, and subsequent developments under Hallé probably prevented its revival. A very considerable library had been accumulated by Mr. Hargreaves, and the committee added largely to it. This eventually passed to the Corporation, and forms part of the 'Dr. Watson Library,' and the interest from investments of the £1,000 furnishes assistance to the musical students of the University.

The appearance of His Grace the Duke of Devonshire as chairman of the dinner given by the Coronation Choir (see p. 533), recalls the fact that at least one ancestor of the Cavendish family was a musician of repute. In the tenor and sextus parts of John Wilbye's first set of English Madrigals to 3, 4, 5 and 6 voices (printed by Thomas Este, 1598) there is a dedication 'To the right worshipfull and vallerous Knight, Sir Charles Cavendish,' dated from the 1st Augustine Fryers the XII of April 1598, in which Mr. Wilbye refers to 'your [Sir Charles Cavendish's] excellent skill in Musicke, and your great love and favour of musicke.'

The preliminary list of programmes of the Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts has been issued. It would make remarkable reading were we not accustomed to these annual displays of prodigious energy in concert-giving. The season, which is mapped out on the usual plan, lasts from August 12 to October 21, and consists of sixty-one concerts. To the frequent concert-goer it will not be a season of unusual interest, but to the popular taste the list of 'hackneyed' works at the Promenades will provide, as it always has provided, an unequalled education in the good things of music. Sir Henry Wood will conduct every night except on Tuesdays, September 5, September 26, and October 10, when his place will be taken by Dr. Georg Henschel. The list of novelties is as follows :—

Pavane	...	...	...	...	Ravel.
Waltz, from 'Der Rosenkavalier'	...	...	...	...	Strauss.
Roumanian Rhapsody, No. 1	...	...	...	...	Georges Enesco.
Swedish Rhapsody, 'Midsommarvaka,' Op. 19,	...	...	...	...	Hugo Alfvén.
'Shepherd Fennel's Dance'	...	...	...	...	Balfour Gardiner.
Three pieces for oboe and orchestra	...	...	...	...	Hamilton Hartly.
Suite, 'Children's corner' (newly orchestrated)	...	...	...	...	Debussy.
Variations on an Irish Air (Op. 29)	...	...	...	...	Norman O'Neill.
Suite for flute and orchestra, 'The Flute of Pan' (Op. 15)	...	...	...	...	Jules Mouquet.
Small Suite for orchestra	...	...	...	...	Cecil Forsyth.
Petite Suite for flute and orchestra	...	...	...	...	Henri Büsser.
Symphonic Poem, 'Antonie et Cléopâtre'	...	...	...	...	Raymond Roze.
Fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra	...	...	...	...	Louis Aubert.
Orchestral Rhapsody, 'A passer-by'	...	...	...	...	C. B. Rootham.
Suite for orchestra (Op. 9)	...	...	...	...	Georges Enesco.
Miniature Suite	...	...	...	...	Eric Coates.
Canon, by Schumann (Op. 56, No. 5), orchestrated by	...	...	...	...	Francis G. Sanders.
Suite...	...	...	...	...	Bach-Mahler.

Viewing the programmes as an index of public taste the following statistics may be of interest. Wagner, of course stands somewhat apart, as having a special night devoted to his works every week. His name appears on the programmes no fewer than 121 times. Next in order of popularity are Beethoven, thirty-four times ; Tchaikovsky, thirty ; Mozart, twenty-eight ; Dvorák and Weber, sixteen each ; Brahms, Elgar and Bach, fourteen each ; Liszt, thirteen ; Handel, Berlioz and Saint-Saëns, twelve each ; Grieg and Schubert, ten each. Mendelssohn is represented by nine pieces. These sixteen composers occupy considerably more than half the scheme. The 'Tannhäuser' Overture with seven performances will be the most frequently heard work ; the 'Meister-singer' and 'Tristan' Preludes, the 'Peer Gynt' Suite and the '1812' Overture will each be played six times. British music supplies seventy-eight out of a total of 629 items, or 12.4 per cent.

We are glad to record that His Majesty has conferred the insignia of C. V. O. upon Sir Frederick Bridge.

The formation of a Society of Women Musicians (see p. 535) is one of the signs of the times. It is certain that at present in music, as well as in other activities, the sex is becoming constructive. The significance of the fact that, although women hitherto have enjoyed equal educational advantages with the other sex, they have not excelled or nearly equalled men as composers, has often been discussed. Are they about to enter into their joint inheritance? Miss Eggar, at the meeting of the new Society, declared that she believed that although women had no past in creating music they had a tremendous future. In a witty speech made at the Royal Academy of Music Club dinner on July 24, Mr. L. N. Parker, in proposing the health of the ladies, said that at first he thought he would speak of woman as a composer, but afterwards he thought he would not do so. He went on to say that woman had inspired man with some of his finest music, and that he did not think a source of inspiration could inspire itself. In a word, he was incredulous. But surely there are other objective inspirations conceivable besides that of the opposite sex?

Last month we recorded with regret the disbandment of the Maggie Madrigal Society. Now we are glad, as a set-off, to announce that the Oriana Madrigal Society, which has been in existence seven years, is making a bid for expansion. It is proposed to re-organize the choir, and to increase its numbers to 100. The aims of the Society are high, and purely artistic, and it may be hoped that the programme announced will draw chorists who appreciate the beauty and charm of the old madrigal school, the best exemplifications of which the Society will rehearse. One of the attractions of this school of composition to good vocalists is that the practice does not involve wear and tear of voice. Readers who desire further information should apply to the hon. conductor, Mr. Charles Kennedy Scott, 57, Addison Road, W.

Mr. Hammerstein retains his unbounded confidence in the opera-going capacity of the British public, and has issued the following provisional programme of works to be given during the forthcoming Autumn season at his new opera house now approaching completion:—(In French.)—'Quo Vadis,' 'Don Quichotte,' 'Thais,' 'Le Jongleur de Notre Dame,' 'Hérodiade,' 'Manon,' 'Werther,' 'La Navarraise,' 'Les Contes d'Hoffmann,' 'Faust,' 'Roméo et Juliette,' 'Lakmé,' 'Le Prophète,' 'Les Huguenots,' 'Louise,' 'Le Luthier de Crémone,' and 'Carmen.' (In Italian.)—'Norma,' 'Il Trovatore,' 'La Favorita,' 'Siberia,' 'Dolores,' 'Otello,' 'Lucia di Lammermoor,' 'Rigoletto,' 'La Traviata,' 'Il Barbiere di Siviglia,' 'Aida,' 'Andrea Chenier,' and 'Un Ballo in Maschera.' 'I Pagliacci' and 'Cavalleria Rusticana' are announced, but the owners of the rights say that no arrangement has been made. The season opens on November 11, and will last twenty weeks. Performances will be given on Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Saturday nights, and Saturday afternoons.

From an advertisement recounting the attractions of a well-known sea-side resort on the North-east coast:

It appeals to those who love good music tempered (!) with delightful breezes from the sea.

Elsewhere we often temper the audiences!

THE THANKSGIVING SERVICE AT ST. PAUL'S

On June 29, St. Paul's Cathedral was once again the centre of the British Empire, for there and on that day our King and Queen returned thanks after their Coronation, surrounded by their loyal subjects, and every emblem of solemn ritual. It was indeed fitting that the Cathedral of the city of the world should be the scene of such a service, and other similar occasions at once present themselves to the mind. In 1872 the recovery from serious illness of our late King, when Prince of Wales, drew to the Cathedral his revered mother Queen Victoria for a service of Thanksgiving, while the Diamond Jubilee of 1897, and the Thanksgiving Service after their Coronation of King Edward and Queen Alexandra are still fresh in the memory of the British nation.

The service in June last was an important one to Church musicians, affording them a rare opportunity of using their art for the beautifying of the ceremony, for, with the exception of the special Prayers, the act of Thanksgiving was intimately associated with music. The special choir consisted of the members of the Cathedral choir and those of Westminster Abbey, the Chapel Royal, and representatives of the leading choirs of London. The instrumental part was supplied by a special orchestra, while Mr. Charles Macpherson played the organ with dignified restraint. Sir George Martin of course conducted, and upon him fell the arrangement of the manifold detail inseparable from such an occasion. We have long learned to expect perfection at St. Paul's, but nothing finer, from its grand simplicity, has ever been achieved there.

The long interval of waiting was utilised by the performance of orchestral music by native composers, each conducting his own composition. The works were given in the following order—Sir F. Bridge's 'Triumphal March,' Dr. Walford Davies's 'Solemn Melody,' Sir A. C. Mackenzie's 'An English Joy-Peal,' the Finale from Sir H. Parry's 'English Symphony,' the Finale from Sir C. Stanford's 'Symphony in D minor,' and Sir E. Elgar's 'Coronation March' (1911). Thus was afforded an interesting survey of the development of English musical art, which by its variety, no less than its appropriate character, added greatly to the interest of the congregation. At last the sound of distant cheers and that indefinable murmur of expectancy always experienced on such occasions, announced the arrival of the King and Queen. As the Royal party entered the Cathedral the trumpeters and drummers of the Coldstream Guards, ranged in front of the choir steps, burst forth with a splendid fanfare, under the direction of Lieut. Dr. Mackenzie Rogan. The service commenced with the singing of the National Anthem, in which the congregation joined, the whole effect, enhanced by the presence of Their Majesties, being overwhelmingly fine. The Te Deum specially composed by Sir George Martin followed, and again illustrated that unerring instinct for appropriateness and breadth of treatment for which his works are conspicuous. It was splendidly performed, the choir realising their opportunity, and the orchestra and organ lending ample support. After the reading of prayers by the Bishop of London, Handel's familiar 'Zadok the Priest' was given with its glittering effect, and all the associations of the great Coronation Service of the previous week vividly recalled. That it received a dignified rendering need hardly be stated. Its effect was superb, and will long remain in the memory of those who heard it. The Blessing having been pronounced by the Bishop, the hymn 'Now thank we all our God' was sung, and again the whole congregation reinforced the choir with splendid emphasis. This brought the brief and deeply impressive service to a close, the King and Queen afterwards returning in procession to the West Door.

There is no doubt that St. Paul's lends itself in an exceptional manner to these great ceremonies by its ample space and excellent lighting no less than by its wonderful acoustic properties, which are practically perfect when the building is filled with worshippers. We understand that the most delicate portions of the music were as distinctly clear at the western end as in other parts of the Cathedral. Sir George Martin paid a compliment to Church musicians by inviting several prominent members to attend in their Doctors' robes, seats being allotted to them in the Canons' stalls. The occasion was a memorable one, of which every detail of ritual and musical accompaniment was in the highest sense entirely worthy.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICAL CONGRESS.

In our last issue we referred to an article by Prof. Guido Adler on the Congress, which appeared in the Neue Freie Presse dated June 14. We quote from it the following:

I had no doubts as to the ability of Englishmen in music, for historical study had well acquainted me with the important part that England long ago had played in the development of our art, long ago, in the gray Middle Ages, when monks from Ireland chanted their chorals in Germany. They exercised a deeper influence on the progress of music than the singers of the South, for these Irish monks, with their hymns, aided by folk-music and its tendency to harmony, nurtured the seeds of part-singing, which flowered in a parallel-writing in thirds and sixths, bearing the unmistakable impress of English origin. In 1226, like a meteor, there appeared in England the earliest-known canon, 'Sumer is iumen in,' a work of art as fresh and full of spring to-day as when it was created. . . . English pedagogues were responsible in the Middle Ages for excellent treatises, and even in these early times we may notice a special branch of theory which, constantly preserved, has borne good fruit in modern musical science, the formal analysis, of which the English were the pioneers. English music was introduced into various schools of art in the beginning of the 15th century, when Dunstable wrote his thematic-imitation movements, and became the head of a school whose influence was felt when the art of a cappella composition was at its zenith in the 16th century. A countless array of English composers carries the line unbroken through the century to the time of Henry VIII. and Elizabeth—composers who were leaders of music in their native land, and stars of the first magnitude in the firmament of art. The recent historical performances at the London Musical Festival prove that time has not dimmed the beauty of works by such musicians as Thomas Tallis and William Byrd. . . .

Glees were undoubtedly the forerunners of German male-voice compositions, as they were being sung in England in the last quarter of the 17th century. The German male-voice choir did not develop till a century later. . . .

The Historical Chamber Music Concert showed us some of the splendid works that were written in the Restoration period following Queen Elizabeth's time. But the climax was reached with the Purcell scena in the Second Orchestral Concert, incomparably sung by Miss Muriel Foster. We historians exchanged looks, and asked: Did the reforms of Gluck a century later show any advance in dramatic reality and soul-felt expression? Is not this command of vocal expression complete for all time? Sir Charles Stanford had filled up the basso continuo and orchestrated it discreetly and carefully. For me, this performance and the service in St. Paul's were the outstanding features of the Congress. . . .

Even in the 17th century England was sending instrumentalists and vocalists to other countries, and English actors were accompanied by musicians who played their native music in foreign lands. One of the foundations of our modern music, thematic development (motivische Variation), owes its origin to England. . . . It is therefore a pleasure to record that modern English musical life is showing signs of a re-awakening. Mr. Balfour, in his opening speech, rightly said that the period of importation was passing, and expressed the hope that the growth of a new creative art would once again give England a place among the music-producing nations. . . .

An Englishman's guest is adopted into his family and club and made to feel at home. And so it was neither vanity nor Chauvinism that caused the English to offer to their foreign guests at the International Congress only English music. Our hosts wished to lay before us the art of their country and their home for our acceptance and approval. . . . In England, as on the Continent, the art of music is practised not only by professional musicians, but by all classes of society; but the popularity of vocal music and the cult of choral-singing has obtained a much deeper hold in England than with us. The Huddersfield Choral Society, which gave model performances of works by Purcell, Gibbons, Bach and Handel, is recruited largely from working people. They sang with a moving enthusiasm and care for detail which many a 'Bürgerchor' might envy. And there are many such choirs in England! In every province, every district and every town there are choral societies which perform works by Bach and Handel. On such a foundation a new musical edifice can and must be raised. . . .

The most interesting paper on teaching was that which dealt with Tonic Sol-fa, a system dating from the Middle Ages. It was ably illustrated by the boys of an institute [Aristotle Road London County Council School, headmaster, Mr. A. Gibbs], who, though not acquainted with the lecturer (Dr. McNaught), were able to make clear the advantages of this method of teaching singing.

Professor Adler deprecates the fact that he cannot give his critical opinion of the individual works of modern English composers. There was so much to be heard that the impression left was somewhat kaleidoscopic.

Mr. Alfred H. Littleton, Deputy Chairman of the Executive Committee, has received the following letter:

DEAR SIR,—Now that I am back in Paris I hasten to tell you how gratified I have been at the cordial reception you gave me. I shall never forget the efforts by which you made the reception of the Congress of London altogether a brilliant success, and I am happy to be in a position to thank you in the name of the French Government, in the name of the Paris Section of the Society, and for myself in person.

Please accept my most cordial good wishes.

JULES ECORCHEVILLE.

The delegates to the London Congress from Foreign Governments were: Austria, Prof. Dr. Guido Adler; (Hungary, Mons. Alexandre de Bertha); Bavaria, Prof. Dr. Adolf Sandberger; Denmark, Prof. Dr. Angul Hammerich; France, Mons. Jules Ecorcheville, Docteur-ès-lettres; Greece, Mons. Michel Calvocoressi; Holland, Dr. D. F. Scheurler; Italy, Professore Vito Fedeli, Maestro Giorgio Barini and Maestro Alberto Visetti; Mexico, Don Julian Carrillo; Prussia, Geh. Regierungsrat Prof. Dr. Hermann Kretzschmar; Roumania, Professor Stefan Sihleano; Russia, Mons. Léon Auer and Mons. Pierre Tscheremissinoff; Saxony, Prof. Dr. Gustav Schreck; Spain, Señor Cecilio de Roda; Sweden, Herr Richard Anderson; United States of America, Mr. O. G. Sonneck; Uruguay, Dr. Carlos Néry.

Foreign Institutions also sent delegates, thus: Basel Allgemeine Musikgesellschaft, Mons. Louis La Roche-Burckhardt; Erlangen University, Prof. Dr. Richard Falckenberg; Lemberg Conservatorium, Director H. Mieczulaw Soltys; Lemberg 'Kolo Mazyczne,' Prof. Ignacy Fuhrmann, Lund University, Prof. Tobias Norlind; McGill University (Montreal), Prof. T. Wesley Mills; Saxony, Kirchenchor-Verband der evang.-luther. Landeskirche, Church-Music Director Johannes Biehle.

Dr. H. Leichtentritt writes as follows in the Signale:

As regards the reception arrangements, and the quality and quantity of musical performances, the Congress quite came up to the high standard set by the brilliant festival in Vienna two years ago. But the organization of the scientific part of the proceedings left much to be desired. Fortunately this matter is not very serious, as the papers will be printed later in the official account of the Congress. If the International Musical Society is to do good work as a scientific body at the Congresses, it is imperative that the people who have something to say should not remain in the background while second- and third-rate speakers occupy the platform. We were too often reminded that there are some people who confuse scientific ability with a diligent study of the dictionary. Of more importance to me than the lectures on every conceivable subject connected with ancient and modern musical history was the personal intercourse with prominent members of the Society from every conceivable country. Practically every English musician of importance took part in the proceedings. A long series of concerts gave us a valuable bird's-eye view of the development of English music from the 15th century till the present time. The brilliant choral performances made a very deep impression. Possibly the choir of the Thomas Church, Leipzig, and the choirs of the Berlin and Regensburg Cathedrals may be compared with the choir of St. Paul's, but I am inclined to think the London choir is pre-eminent in vocal quality and purity of intonation. In Germany we have absolutely nothing like the mixed choral societies (amateur), the Magpie Madrigal Society or the Huddersfield Choir. Our best choirs fail only too often when they are robbed of the orchestra's support. We heard a goodly number of the beautiful old English madrigals of the Elizabethan period, as well as the solemn church music of Gibbons, Byrd, and others. In the chamber concerts, too, much string-music of outstanding excellence was performed. And before all, Purcell, of whom we know nothing in Germany, was shown to us a musician of first importance. Scenes from his dramatic works, church music and chamber music, gave us an insight into his strength and versatility. But modern English music, as well as classical, was well represented. Among contemporary composers in England there are two schools. To one belong composers like Mackenzie, Parry and Stanford, the representatives of classical, academic art—and in this case 'academic' has no belittling significance. In direct contrast to these masters of form stands the young group, the secessionists, whose strongest representative is Elgar. But even he has marked leanings towards the right wing. The extreme left, represented by such men as Cyril Scott and Holbrooke, has burnt its boats and given itself up to artistic anarchy with such success that their wild cacophonies, in most cases, obliterate all personality, and render the work of one indistinguishable from that of another. It remains to be seen whether the young juice of the grapes will become a fine vintage. Certain it is that there is a great deal of artistic talent and energy in English music at present, which in any case is a very hopeful sign. Elgar's second Symphony, which I infinitely prefer to his first, and Parry's Symphonic Variations of masterly structure, appeared to me to be the most important works. It only remains to give a short account of the society functions. The Congress was remarkable for the fact that it was the first occasion of this character on which the English Government and the City authorities took an official part in the proceedings; the Government gave a splendid reception and lunch at the House of Commons, while the Lord Mayor not only received the members most hospitably at the Mansion House, but also took the chair at the banquet at the Savoy Hotel. His speech on this occasion was a masterpiece of expression, wit, thought and style. [Reported verbatim in the July Musical Times, pp. 446-7.] One of the most interesting events of the week was the reception by the ancient guild of 'The Worshipful Company of Grocers,' one of the richest of London Companies, who treated us royally in their palace. The reception at the great house of Novello was brilliant. And one night, about twelve o'clock, we all repaired to the offices of the Daily Telegraph, to take a peep behind the scenes at the production of a world's newspaper. A festival operatic performance at Covent Garden ended the Congress: 'Rigoletto,' with Tetrassini and Sammarco, a performance it would be hardly possible to equal in Germany as far as regards vocal art. When one adds to all these varied entertainments the impression which London in its immensity makes on visitors, it appears no exaggeration to say that this London Festival week will always remain a deep and lasting memory with all those who were fortunate enough to take part in it.

Dr. Johannes Wolff writes the following in the Journal of the International Musical Society:

Sunshine, mid-season, and the anticipated glories of the Coronation, combined to make a setting for the London Congress more brilliant than which it would be impossible to conceive. For many it was a rush of pleasure from the first minute to the last. Receptions and concerts, hospitality everywhere, in little things as well as great. First and foremost came the reception by the world-known music house, Novello & Co., which combined its centenary celebrations with the Congress. In the brilliantly-lighted and decorated room of the firm, England's leading professors, and a select circle of musicians from all quarters of the globe, with their ladies, met together and made a richly-coloured picture. Intellectual and musical entertainment preserved the balance with material refreshment. A splendid collection of a hundred fine examples of music-printing from the 15th to the end of the 17th century, a beautifully-produced catalogue of which was presented as a souvenir-gift by the owner, Alfred H. Littleton [head of the firm], rivetted the attention. From above fell the tones of a small and select body of singers, who sang beautiful English glees of the 18th century by Calcott, Evans, Horsley, Cooke, Webbe, and others, while below the wine sparkled. It was a real brotherhood of the world that was welcomed and honoured.

A CRITIC'S ADVICE.

MR. BENNETT AND A YOUTHFUL ASPIRANT.

Many musicians have had cause to be grateful to the late Mr. Joseph Bennett for the kindly interest he took in their early endeavours, and it is well known that in his ardent devotion to the art he made considerable personal sacrifice outside the sphere of his professional duties. But the breadth of his sympathies could not be better exemplified than in the following letter to a youthful aspirant who had sought his advice. This letter has not only an interesting bearing on the present-day discussion on the need of a school for musical critics, but it throws some light on Bennett's own methods in acquiring his wide knowledge of musical works and in cultivating his distinguished literary style, almost Addisonian in its purity. In the whole-hearted response to the appeal of a complete stranger we have revealed the best side of a noble nature. Mr. Bennett's advice was sought by the writer, an old cathedral choir-boy, then a youth of twenty, who had just been launched into journalism, the only claim to consideration being membership of the chief musical institutions of Mr. Bennett's native county, in the capital city where he had so many other admirers. The sympathetic and encouraging reply speaks for itself. Its influence is still paramount, and the writer's chief regret is that the eminent critic passed away without seeing some signs of what progress has been made by following his advice. The letter reads as follows:

109, Finchley Road,

January 13, 1904.

DEAR SIR,—I have read your letter with a good deal of sympathy, recalling my own aspirations when I was as young as yourself. With regard to the question whether you should 'specialise' at once or act as a journalist in general, my advice is to take the second course, because that is more likely to give you a position in which your musical attainments would have a chance of becoming known. It is true that I began with music, and went on into special correspondence, leader-writing, &c. But circumstances are different now. In my young time decent musical critics were scarce, and I had the ball under my foot, as the saying goes. Now they abound—so much abound that to get a footing is weary work. So, stick to your all-round journalism, and let your editor see that among the things you do best is musical criticism. The desired result will follow in due time.

You are a young man : do not be a young man in a hurry. I was fourteen years older than you before I touched musical criticism, and spent those years largely in making acquaintance with musical works of all kinds ; in studying the literature of the art ; the styles of composers, &c. ; and in cultivating a mode of utterance such as seemed likely to hold the attention of readers. You should do the same, and add as much as possible to your general knowledge. Do you know German ? If not, learn it—French also, both being indispensable. Of course, all this means plodding. Never mind, plod, and lift up your heart. I have read the cuttings you sent. They represent, of course, musical reporting, but you will do vastly better in a little time if you take the course I have marked out. Meanwhile, accept one or two hints. Never begin an opening sentence with the definite article. It is bad form. Use your laudatory adjectives with a proper sense of proportion. You speak of the 'marvellous technique' of Zwintscher ; what could you say more of Paderewski's technique ? Avoid French words when there are English equivalents. Most important of all, look through your programme for an opportunity of instructing your readers. Doing this you will rise above reporting into criticism, or very near it.

This is all I have now to say. But write a little essay on the differences of style, method, and character between Bach and Handel, and let me see it.—Very truly yours,

JOSEPH BENNETT.

THE BAYREUTH 'STIMMUNG' :

A SUBTLE FORCE.

BY BERTRAM SMITH.

'Bayreuth,' if I may be permitted the misquotation, 'is not a place. It is a frame of mind.'

It is true that its performances no longer stand out beyond all competition as a thing apart. For its supremacy—accepted for many years without question—has at last been challenged. Munich has entered the field with a theatre compounded of all that is good in the Bayreuth Festspielhaus, and such improvements as have been evolved by twenty years' experience. And there every summer a Wagner festival is held upon the grand scale. Since Covent Garden performances were in the hands of Dr. Richter, they also have reached a high level of distinction, and in many other places Bayreuth has been copied, and in some particulars improved upon, with striking effect. And so it has come to pass that an age of criticism has set in. We read much of the 'departed glories' of Bayreuth, of the 'twilight of the gods' ; and I notice that it has become fashionable to talk of the hampering influences of tradition, the slowness of the tempo, or the woodenness of the acting.

But while it may be true that Munich can boast a more distinguished list of conductors, and London a more dazzling array of stars, the glories of Bayreuth have not yet departed ; and in so far as perfection of detail and massed effects of great beauty are traditions, the management is admittedly bound by tradition.

For myself, I never feel in any other theatre quite the same sense of security and confidence that all will be well as I do when I take my seat at Bayreuth—and there is much in that. I know at least that whatever else may happen Siegfried's sword will break the anvil, and the roof of the Gibichung's Hall will not collapse before the appointed time. Grane, the horse, brings with him no terrors for me, whereas on any other stage I watch him with a fearful and furtive eye, lest he should rebel and put his foot through something ; and I know that I shall find no nets among the trees or wires drawn across the stage in sundry places, but that the illusion will be perfect and complete.*

The true Bayreuther is far beyond the reach of adverse criticism, for he knows that Bayreuth gives something that he can find nowhere else, the real festival spirit—in a word ; and an almost untranslatable word, the 'Stimmung.'

The Wagnerian is naturally sensitive to his surroundings. It is a tragic thing to descend to earth, after the first act of 'Tristan,' with a thud. Emerging from Covent Garden in search of an early dinner, one must make one's way down Bow Street and dodge the passing taxicab in the Strand. The thread is effectively broken, and a grimy world of everyday forces itself upon one's notice. But there is no such sudden descent at Bayreuth. One emerges at once into the woods, or strolls up the hill between ripe fields of grain, to dine beneath the trees at the Bürgerreuther café. The frame is worthy of the picture. I have gone into the theatre after viewing a gorgeous sunset in the world outside to see the effect repeated in the last act of the 'Walkure,' and pleasantly compare the real thing with the counterfeit presentment. There is a harmony, a continuity of atmosphere about the whole evening of a festival performance.

But the beauty of the performances themselves and the charm of the outdoor life that surrounds them are not the only factors that go to make up the 'Stimmung.' I think a great part of the real fascination of Bayreuth belongs to the all-pervading sense of a common aim and a common interest that rests upon the town.

The place is full of pilgrims gathered together from the ends of the earth, by a single idea. There is no one here who is not interested. Even in Munich, which is a wonderfully good reproduction of the real thing, the vast majority of the population is completely indifferent to the proceedings. It is a depressing reflection that your cab-driver or your barber may know nothing of Isolde, and your landlady would be unable to say whether Siegfried killed the dragon or was routed and devoured in the attempt. It is not so in Bayreuth. Your caddy has a cousin who knows a man who sings in the chorus. Your barber has been to a rehearsal, and if you can understand his language will give you a wealth of information about the Wagner household, about the singers, or the new set of scenery. He will tell you with pride how he has cut Dr. Richter's hair, and what the Hofkapellmeister said to him in the course of the operation. The girl who brings your coffee will predict with absolutely certainty, and palpable inaccuracy, the works to be performed in the following summer. We are all Wagnerians, great and small.

The day contains nothing but its performance. Morning and afternoon are spent in preparation for it, and the evening is devoted to retrospection. No letters are ever written. No books are read. One's correspondence dwindles to the level of picture post-cards, adorned with a Wagner motif, and odd hours of retirement from the world are spent in a feverish study of obscure passages in the Text.

In the course of the forenoon one may engage in the pleasant sport of programme buying. Many unofficial programmes are published : anyone with a little imagination is capable of publishing a programme. They appear at intervals of about half an hour, boldly setting forth a list of singers for the evening, and generally speaking no two are quite alike, and all are wrong. They form an interesting collection and are a fair subject for small bets. After this, one drifts into the shops to marvel at the astounding collection they contain of Wagner products of one sort and another—photographs innumerable, Wagner busts, Wagner pictures, leather purses with a motif stamped upon them, musical 'guides' and scores, texts and opera-glasses, and a hundred other things. Indeed the imagination of the Bayreuth shop-keeper carries him far further than this. You may buy a pipe wrought in the form of the dragon, or a pair of braces adorned with semi-quavers.

The air is full of rumours, and one may at any time come upon a celebrity in the streets or cafés; at one moment Wotan drinking beer like any common man, at another perhaps Magdalena buying postage stamps. These also are events of importance. The festival spirit has you firmly in its grip. When you find the local paper devotes half a column to the news of the rest of the world, it seems to you a very just proportion. And you take no interest whatever in the fine old opera house, or the stories of its past glories related by the guide, until you hear that 'Lohengrin' was once performed there. Then you feel that you have ascertained a solid fact. The day wears on to its climax in the evening, and the hour in an open-air café that follows, and at the last as one lies wondering how Wagner expected anyone to sleep after all that, one hears the sound of some late reveller in the street below whistling the seven notes of the sword motif.

There are no doubt some who are beyond the reach of the pervading influence, and who still have power to break the spell. On one occasion the first voice to disturb the long silence which follows the fall of the curtain at the end of 'Parsifal' was that of a cheerful American gentleman, who must surely have returned to the normal frame of mind with startling rapidity. 'Well,' he said, rising from his seat, 'I guess the next best thing to that is a strawberry ice'!

THE SYMPHONIC POEM SINCE LISZT.

By HERBERT ANTCLIFFE.

The new era of the Symphonic Poem, the era in which it was to become a recognized and independent cabinet for the exhibiting of definite principles of musical structure, began some seventy-five years ago, when, according to Lina Raman, the biographer of Liszt, 'the idea of symphonic poesy . . . dawned within him.' We are safe in fixing this date (1835) as that on which the Lisztian poems first came into being, for, although it was not until some twelve years later that the idea was fully developed and brought forward in the first of the symphonic poems, it was in relation to the subject of that work, Victor Hugo's 'Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne,' that the idea occurred. Since he finished these attempts to emancipate music from the thralldom of formalism and to place on firm ground the principles of musical structure and the interrelation of the arts for which he so earnestly contended, there have been numberless works in old and new forms and in no form at all (if such can be called works), which have professedly been following his principles and have been given the designation which he invented. There are also many works to which the composers have not given this title but to which it has been given by common consent. The orchestral works of Richard Strauss are a good and well-known example of this. Among his own descriptions of his works commonly known as symphonic poems are 'Fantastic Variations,' 'Symphonic fantasia,' 'Rondo form' and 'Symphony.' M. Saint-Saëns, of course, frankly and openly acknowledges his indebtedness to Liszt for both the title and the form. His contribution to the number of symphonic poems therefore has little effect upon the development of musical form, or of this particular form, except that by the effectiveness and popularity of some of the works, the Lisztian principles have been more firmly established on the rock foundation of popular acceptance. So far as Liszt's method is concerned, the best brief description of it is that of the late Professor Prout in his book on 'Applied Forms.' It may be described, he says, 'as a free application and modification of the variation form.' The objection to this description or definition is that it might be applied with some degree of appropriateness to practically every form that is not based upon actual repetition or complete divergence of thematic material. Almost all musical forms are based on this principle of variation, and many on the actual lines of separate, though undivided, variations of a particular theme. The difference between Liszt's method and that adopted in ordinary variations is that the former is to change the entire theme by transposition of pitch, time or rhythm, while the latter allows of actual alteration of notes and intervals and of repetition of figures and motives and variation of intervals. This 'metamorphosis of themes' is the basic principle on which later composers have, generally speaking, erected their multifarious edifices of formal experiment. The Editor of the new edition of Grove's 'Dictionary,' writing some three or four years ago, and yielding to his own predilection in favour of absolute music, speaks of the symphonic poem in somewhat disparaging terms, and supplies little information as to its development. The term, he says, 'apparently is always held to imply the presence of a "programme," in which the function of the music is to illustrate the poetical material, not to be self-subsistent, as in all classical compositions. At present, too, it would seem that the absence of any recognisable design in the composition is considered essential to success, and Liszt's device of transforming his themes and presenting them in new disguises, rather than of developing them according to the older principles, seems also to be a rule of the form. As existing specimens from Liszt to Richard Strauss in Germany and from Saint-Saëns to Debussy in France have so very little in common with the design of the true symphony, the term "tone-poem" or "Tondichtung" is preferred by some composers, who very likely feel relieved of all responsibility by the adoption of the vaguer title.'

Apart from the unnecessary sneer at the 'absence of any recognisable design,' he would seem to have apprehended the salient features of the construction of most symphonic poems. What 'the design of the true symphony' is, might however be a question not easy to answer. It may be that of the symphonies of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Brahms or Elgar, or even of Bruckner or Mahler. If we say that of Beethoven, then the question arises whether it is that of the fourth or the ninth, or of which of the others. In a previous article* I have pointed out that the Choral Symphony has all the essential characteristics of the symphonic poem except that of the transformation of the themes. In the same way we might say that 'Ein Heldenleben' has the essential characteristics of the symphony in its three contrasted principal sections. 'Don Quixote' (according to Mr. Ernest Newman 'the most revolutionary work of our generation') on the other hand is symphonic only in dimensions, not in form. In main principles the composer has gone to Liszt and to Beethoven, and adopted a combination of the variation forms of both.

Although in speaking of the symphonic poem of to-day, we usually think of Strauss and others of the same school, we must not forget that other composers of totally different ideas and ideals have used the term freely and with definite purpose. Beethoven and Mendelssohn and some of their successors have employed choruses and solo voices to increase and vary the tone in their symphonies. Partisans of the new form go further than this, and some of them have written works in which the choir takes an important (sometimes the most important) part throughout, and called these Symphonic Poems. The orchestral tissue of Wagner's music-dramas, too, not infrequently is spoken of as the symphonic poem, and by this term distinguished from the vocal narrative and dialogue. The title is not at all unsuitable when we consider Wagner's methods, and that he was not unaware or unwilling to make use of the potentialities of theme transformation when it suited his purpose: witness the evident relations of the themes of the Mastersingers and the Apprentices, and that less evident between the Love Feast and the Grail themes of 'Parsifal,' as well as the modification of all his various motives to meet the exigencies of varying circumstances.

One of the difficulties of saying what the symphonic poem is or is not, arises from the fact that, unlike most art-forms, it is used as a means of freedom, and sometimes of licence, and not as a means of restraint. Strauss has, in 'Tod und Verklärung' and in 'Ein Heldenleben' adopted a sequence of movements or sections which, though based on the poetic requirements of the programme, follow the main principles of classical form, and may be the germ of future cyclic forms. M. Vincent d'Indy has in one case simply written a series of variations and then reversed them so that the theme, an unharmonized melody, comes at the end instead of at the beginning of the work. This is done to represent the gradual divestiture of a person who was compelled to part with a garment at each gate on the road to the nether regions and appear naked on the goal being reached.

Perhaps the most important, and certainly to many of us the most interesting, question is that of what is to be the future of the symphonic poem. Before much progress can be made, however, the ground will have to be cleared to some extent. The term 'symphonic poem' is too comprehensive. That of 'tone-poem' is more so. The clearance is already started in some directions. In some less important ones it was started before Liszt. We have now the 'Ballade for orchestra,' the 'Nocturne' for the same, the 'Concerto-poem,' 'Tableaux symphoniques,' 'Ballades symphoniques,' 'Idylls,' 'Legends,' symphonic or merely orchestral, 'Réveries,' 'Elegies,' and 'Scenes.' Why should we not place things on a better and more orderly basis, and, while retaining in the different works the ground principles of the form, give to each work its proper title according to its dimensions and character? The title 'symphonic poem' should surely be retained only for cyclic works containing several movements. We do not call a single movement a symphony, even though it be constructed on symphonic principles, but we name it Overture, Rondo, Scherzo, or whatever is most appropriate. Tone-poem must of necessity be still more comprehensive and include everything in music of a poetic character, from the shortest lyrical pieces to the longest cycle, such as that of twenty-four symphonic poems projected many years ago by Professor Granville Bantock but not yet carried out. 'Symphonic ode' is a quite natural title appropriately used by Félicien David, and 'Symphony cantata' also describes itself. In purely orchestral music is there any reason why we should not have a 'Tone epic,' a 'Sonnet,' based on the same rhythmic and rhyming principles as the verse form of that name, or any other poetic form adapted to music and called by its appropriate title? It is not necessary, of course, that the programme of a symphonic or other tone-poem should have been expressed previously in one of the other arts—in painting, poetry, &c. The most satisfactory from a purely musical point of view of all Strauss's poems ('Tod und Verklärung') was conceived and executed before any idea of putting it into words was suggested. Several of Liszt's pianoforte tone-poems, too, were the source of inspiration for pictures by his artist friends and not the outcome of such pictures. In view of what appears to be the case, the following definition of the term 'symphonic poem' would appear to be suitable: 'A piece of music in one or more movements written for orchestra (with or without the addition of human voices) and based upon ideas not in themselves essentially musical, and constructed on the principles of theme-transformation developed and first definitely put into practice by Franz Liszt.' The definition will probably require amendment in a few years' time, whether the suggestion for the allotment of other titles for separate forms of varying length and proportions be adopted or not, but it appears to cover the ground of all known works bearing this designation. With all probable developments of the idea concealed (or perhaps more correctly, exposed) in the practice of calling works by this name, however, it hardly seems likely that any composer will find it feasible to adopt Mr. E. A. Baughman's suggestion and make it 'an entirely musical production.' The suggestive and descriptive capabilities of music have extended far; but not yet so far as this.

ORGANS BUILT FOR THE ROYAL PALACE OF WHITEHALL.

BY ANDREW FREEMAN.

Much uncertainty exists about the various organs which were formerly in the Royal Palace of Whitehall, and many wrong statements have been made: due partly to the confusion as to the buildings in which the said organs were placed, but more especially to the lack of documents dealing with the instruments and their builders.

I have been fortunate enough to come across some documents amongst the Treasury and Domestic State Papers in the Record Office and in the British Museum bearing on these matters, whilst 'The King's Musick,' by the Rev. H. Cart de Lafontaine, recently published, contains much valuable information. 'The King's Musick' consists of all the references to musical matters contained in the books of the Lord Chamberlain's Office. By collating these, it is hoped that so far as the Whitehall organs are concerned 'the crooked shall be made straight and the rough places plain.'

In order to avoid further misapprehension it will be as well to mention the chief buildings in Whitehall in which organs were placed. These were three in number<sup>1</sup>:

I. The Old Chapel Royal.—This important building took up the whole of one side of the Great Court, facing the principal entrance. Its position was between the present Banqueting Hall and the River. It was destroyed by fire on January 2, 1698.

II. The Banqueting Hall.—This, the only portion of the Palace now remaining, was built in the years 1619-22, from the designs of Inigo Jones. It was used as the Chapel Royal almost immediately after the destruction of the Old Chapel, and thereafter was spoken of either as the 'Banqueting House Chapel' or as the 'Chapel Royal.' (It was the use of the latter title which, though perfectly correct, has led to much of the present confusion.) Since 1890 it has been used as the Museum of the United Service Institution.

III. The Queen's Chapel.—This was built by James II., about the year 1685, for Roman Catholic Services. Evelyn attended a service here on January 30, 1687, when he refers to it as 'the new Popish Chappell.'

Now as to the organs in these three buildings :

I. THE OLD CHAPEL ROYAL.

A document dated February 12, 1636-37, authorizes the Treasurer and Undertreasurer of the Exchequer to 'pay or cause to be paid to our trustye and welbelovéd Servant Edward Norgate Esqr the sūme of one hundred and forty pounds to be employed for the alteringe and reparacon of the organ in our Chappell at Hampton Court and for the makinge of a new Chaire Organ there Comformable to those already made in our Royall Chappells at whitehall and Greenwich.' From this it will be gathered that previous to 1636 the organ at Whitehall contained two manuals, 'Great' and 'Chaire,' and that the 'Chaire' organ was a comparatively recent addition.

All the repairs which are mentioned as having been done in the reign of Charles I. were of an unimportant character, the last reference to the instrument prior to the Civil War being found in a 'Warrant for the payment of 25*l*. 12*s*. to Mr. Edward Norgate, Keeper of his Majesty's organs, for reparations of his organs at Whitehall, Greenwich and Hampton Court, for one year ended at Christmas 1640.<sup>78</sup>

The name of the organ-builder employed to effect these alterations and repairs does not transpire. Norgate himself was not an organ-builder in any sense of the word, though in addition to many other positions at Court, he held, from 1611 onwards, the grant (with survivorship) of the office of Tuner of his Majesty's virginals, organs and other instruments, jointly with Andrea Bassano. Full particulars of his career will be found in the 'Dictionary of National Biography.'

During the Civil War there was little time to think about organs, and this one probably remained in a more or less neglected condition until one fine day during the Commonwealth someone of influence seems to have carried it away to his own home. At any rate it was removed from the Chapel, and not destroyed, for the following quotation from a most interesting petition of John Playford 'To His most Sacred Majestie Charles the Second King of Great Britaine France and Ireland Defendor of the Faith &c.'<sup>79</sup> shows that it was recovered and set up in the Chapel at the Restoration.

The petition, dated 1673—too long, unfortunately to be given in full—states, 'That your petition' hath bin euer Loyall to your Majesties Intrest and testified to the same to the hazard of his Life and Fortunes in the time of the Late Rebellion, And at the time of your Majesties most happy Restauration did procure both the Organ and Books belonging to your Majesties Chappell Royall, w<sup>ch</sup> had bin embezled during those times . . . , and shows that it must have been the old Pre-Restoration organ which Pepys heard on July 8, 1660—exactly three months after the proclamation of Charles II. Hitherto most writers on the subject have united in declaring that the organ which Pepys listened to was the first instrument built by Father Smith in England, but the above testimony is sufficient to set this matter at rest. Father Smith's instrument will be dealt with later on.

The Pre-Restoration organ was considered to be inadequate—possibly, also, its condition had not improved during its period of exile—and a new instrument was soon erected in its place, as the following extracts show :

'Pr. seale for providing an organ for Whitehall Chappell.

'Our will and pleasure is, that you forthwth prepare a Bill for our Royall signature to Passe our privy Seale warranting our Treasurer & undertreasurer of our Excheq<sup>r</sup> for the time being out of the treasur remaining in the receipt of our Excheq<sup>r</sup> to pay or cause to be paid unto our trusty and well-belovéd servant John Hingeston Keeper & repaire of our Instrum<sup>ts</sup>; or his Assign<sup>s</sup> the sūme of 900*l*. for y<sup>e</sup> furnishing and providing a fair doble Organ for y<sup>e</sup> use of our Chappell in our pallace of white Hall y<sup>e</sup> sd sūme to be received by y<sup>e</sup> said John Hingeston.

'Given y<sup>e</sup> 21st day of Octob. in y<sup>e</sup> 14th year of our reigne.

The '14th year of our reigne' was, of course 1662, Charles II. considering that his reign commenced in 1649, but if any doubt should exist upon this point it would be swept away by the existence of 'A Warrant to y<sup>e</sup> Excheq<sup>r</sup> for y<sup>e</sup> payment of 900*l*.' for providing this organ, dated October 31st, 1662.<sup>81</sup>

Another warrant, bearing date July 23, 1662, 'for the enlarging of his Majesty's organ loft at Whitehall, as John Hingeston, Keeper of his Majesty's organs, shall inform you shall be necessary,'<sup>82</sup> seems to point to the preparations made for the reception of this fine instrument, and taking into consideration the fact that Charles would hardly be likely to order payment for the instrument until its erection had been completed, we shall not be far wrong if we conclude that it was in situ and in playing order in the early part of October, 1662.

On November 22, Treasurer Southampton wills and prays Sir Robert Long 'to draw an Order for payment of the said sūme of 900*l*. unto y<sup>e</sup> sd. Jo. Hingston,'<sup>83</sup> though even then Hingston did not get his money as we shall presently see. Meanwhile the enlarged organ-loft seems to have been unsatisfactory for some reason or other, so that a new one was ordered on August 20, 1663, as set out below :

'Warrant to the surveyor generall to make and erect a large organ loft by his Majesty's Chappell at Whitehall, in the place where formerly the great double organ stood, and to rebuild the rooms over the bellows room, two stories high, as it was formerly, the lower story for the subdeane of his Majesty's Chappell, and the upper story with two rooms, one of them for the organist in wayting and the other for the keeper and repayer of his Majesty's organs, harpsicords, virginals and other instruments, each room to have a chymney and boxes and shelves for keeping the materials belonging to the organ, and the organ books.'<sup>84</sup>

It may be that the 'fair doble organ' was not erected till late in 1663, though it seems more likely that it was placed in the enlarged loft in 1662 and taken down while the new loft was being built. In either event the money difficulty became acute when this instrument was being erected (or re-erected) in the new loft ; witness the following amusing letter :

'Mr. Hingston for y<sup>e</sup> Organ in his ma<sup>ties</sup> Chappell. 300*l*.

'Signed CHARLES R.<sup>10</sup>

A few months later—namely, on November 12, 1664—there is a 'Letter of direction concerning 400*l*. part of 900*l*. due to John Hingston' for providing this organ<sup>11</sup>, and the whole amount really seems to have been paid by March 8 (?) 1665-66, for we find:

'John Hingston's affidavit, read and entered as to the fees paid by him at the Exchequer Offices and the Privy Seal Office on the receipt of 900*l*. for the great organ in His Majesty's Chapel Royal at Whitehall in the years 1662-3-4. (Total fees 50*l*. 9*s*. 0*d*.) Ordered to be allowed to said Hingston<sup>12</sup>.

Even then Hingston had to wait till June 17, 1673, for 59*l*. 18*s*. 10*d*., 'by him disbursed over and above 900*l*. formerly paid him for furnishing a fair double organ in the Chapel Royal at Whitehall'<sup>13</sup>, this amount probably including the above-mentioned fees.

There are a few other entries referring to this particular organ which are interesting enough to quote, since mention of Father Smith is found in some of them.

The first of these is a 'Warr<sup>t</sup> for 130*l*. to John Hingston' for repairs, dated June 14, 1670<sup>14</sup>. (There are several references to this sum, which was still outstanding on June 7, 1672.)

The next one is a 'Warr<sup>t</sup> to the Comm<sup>r</sup> of the Customs to permit . . . Smith, the King's Organ maker, to import severall tools vid<sup>t</sup> 28 little plaines 13 little Chizzells and 6 handles for Chizzells for the repairing the Organ in the Chappell Royall at Whitehall. Given 22 Dec : 1671.'<sup>15</sup> From a list given in another volume<sup>16</sup> we find the total cost of these implements was £01 . 08 - 8*d*., of which 'a little baskett the tooles are in, cost oo . 00 2*d*.'

This mention of Smith as the King's Organ-maker is of interest, as there is no official record of his appointment until May 30, 1681, when he succeeded James Farr, deceased.<sup>17</sup>

Some time previous to 1676, Father Smith lowered the pitch by a semitone—a fact of which, in all probability, we should never have heard had Charles II. been a prompt paymaster. Here is the document:

'Upon the Petition of John Hingston Keeper of his Maj<sup>ties</sup> Organs and Harpsicords praying his Maj<sup>ties</sup> to order y<sup>e</sup> payment of 100*l*. agreed by him to be paid to Barnard Smith for taking half a note lower the Organ in y<sup>e</sup> Chappell, part whereof he hath already paid & is importuned for the rest.

'At the Court of Whitehall, August 12th, 1676, His Maj<sup>ties</sup> being graciously pleased to call to mind that the abovementioned work was done by his own particular command is pleased to recommend it to the R<sup>ty</sup> Hon<sup>ble</sup> the L<sup>d</sup> High Treasurer of England to give order for y<sup>e</sup> payment of y<sup>e</sup> said sum of 100*l*. to the Pet<sup>r</sup> in y<sup>e</sup> readiest way his L<sup>d</sup> conveniently may.

J. WILLIAMSON.<sup>18</sup>

The above seems to be an echo of the dispute recorded in 'The King's Musick' (p. 304), under date June 15 of the same year: 'Whereas Bernard Smyth has petitioned for leave to take his course at law against John Hingston for debt due, order that John Hingston give an appearance at the common law.'

Who built this organ of 1662? Enough is known of Hingston's career to enable us to say that, like his immediate predecessor, Edward Norgate, and his successors Henry Purcell and Dr. John Blow, he was not an organ-builder in the right sense of the word. He would certainly be able to supervise the construction and erection of a new organ, or the carrying out of any necessary repairs, with a more practical knowledge than Norgate, for he was an experienced organist and sound musician.

Can Father Smith have been the actual builder?

It is a significant fact that though there are many records of payments made to Hingston in 'The King's Musick', in which no organ-builder's name is mentioned, yet in the very first bill of his, included in that book, in 1673, and from then till the day of his death in December, 1683, he is shown to have employed Father Smith and no other organ-builder to do whatever work was necessary.

Burney, who was born in 1726, nineteen years after the death of Father Smith, and who lived in London for the greater part of his life, is most explicit upon this point. Writing of Father Smith in his 'History of Music',<sup>19</sup> he tells us that 'The first organ he engaged to build in this country was for the Royal Chapel at Whitehall, which, being hastily put together, did not quite fulfil the expectations of those who were able to judge of its excellence.'<sup>20</sup> This statement has always been accepted as an historic fact, though, with the exception of Rimbault, who left the question open, all authorities have agreed that the organ referred to was the one in the Banqueting House Chapel,<sup>20</sup> apparently because the last-named instrument was an undoubted specimen of Father Smith's work, and on the perfectly unjustifiable assumption that this was the only organ by that maker at Whitehall.

Now it will be shown hereafter that Smith's organ in the Banqueting House Chapel was not built till 1699, and that there was no permanent instrument in that building between 1660 and 1699. If, therefore, Father Smith's first organ<sup>21</sup> was built for Whitehall, it must have been built for the Old Chapel, that is, it must have been the organ which we have had under consideration—the organ of 1662-63.

Unfortunately nothing is known as to the contents of this interesting organ, which, as has been said before, perished in the fire which consumed the Chapel and a large portion of the Palace on January 2, 1698.

<sup>13</sup> Rimbault says that the organ in Westminster Abbey was built by Father Smith in 1660; but the organ appears to have been built in 1669, and not 1660, and the Abbey Records contain no mention of Father Smith till 1694, when he made several additions to the instrument. No other Father Smith organ has as yet been dated earlier than 1664, when the Wells instrument was built.

Church and Organ Music.

ORGAN TOUCH AND PHRASING.

Under the above title, a very interesting and instructive lecture was recently given at the Royal College of Music, Manchester, by Dr. H. A. Harding. The lecturer explained the many changes in the key and pedal mechanism of the organ, and pointed out the influence of those changes on music written for the instrument. We agree with him in deploring the disappearance of the old tracker action, and the loss of individuality in performance which naturally followed. There can be no doubt that in spite of many disadvantages, the older methods enabled the player to feel the pallet, and thus to obtain greater command over it. But the growth in size of organs made the change imperative, and it is to be hoped that to the many facilities offered by pneumatic action we may yet add the responsiveness of the tracker. Dr. Harding dwelt upon the remarkable change in manual touch, illustrating the early and indeed the indispensable legato, and describing the touch possible with the mechanism of to-day. By its means organ playing is likely to become a fine art, and we can point to more than one organist whose performances are astonishing when considered merely as displays of technique. The danger lies in blinding both player and audience to what is artistically suitable to the instrument. The excuse so often tendered that the organ has an exceedingly small répertoire will in view of the revived interest shown in organ composition, soon cease to exist. This is no doubt due to the increased facilities offered by modern tone and mechanism, and we welcome the extraordinary advance in refinement of tone which is so prominent a feature in the work of our leading builders. Dr. Harding points to the many difficulties of the organist in attaining skill in the matters of touch and phrasing, and mentions as examples the variety of uses to which his powers are put, in adapting at sight music from pianoforte score, playing arrangements of orchestral and other works, and the like. He contends that 'the need for the habitual exercise of the faculty which pre-eminently qualifies him as an organist, viz., the power of adaptation, is just what precludes him from becoming an artist of the highest degree.' Other difficulties lie in the inequality of touch found too often on different manuals of the same organ, and even on different notes of the same manual. In organs to which the pneumatic principle is applied there can be no excuse for this. Then the depth of touch at which the pipes will sound is exceedingly important. Our great pianists would never tolerate a pianoforte in which such defects existed. The position of the seat also has its effect on the muscular action of the hands and feet, and the adjustable organ-stool is fortunately becoming more general.

We are somewhat surprised at Dr. Harding's contention when, in pointing out that duration of sound is the only effect of the key action, he argues that there are thus fewer demands on the player's musical sensibility. We cannot agree with him, but claim that no instrument makes a greater demand on the player's quickness of perception and musical instinct than the organ. He also states that organ 'touch' is simply the pressing down (not striking) of keys. This may be so in legato passages, but the refinements and lightness of touch bring much of organ technique into line with that of the pianoforte, while many examples of even the older organ music demand the latter touch. The release of the key is surely of almost greater importance than the depression. We suppose no one would to-day attempt to play the Finale of Mendelssohn's first Organ Sonata by pressing the keys down. It may have formerly been necessary, but a crisp and vigorous touch surely interprets more correctly the composer's meaning, which after all is the safest guide, while every inducement is offered by the modern organ to this end.

In speaking of Phrasing, Dr. Harding rightly demands on the part of the player, a knowledge of musical form and design, without which his attempts at this supremely important branch can never be successful. By such study alone can he formulate his ideas of motives, sections, phrases, &c., which are as necessary to the organist as punctuation, syntax and grammar are to the literary student. It is surely time that the classical organ works should be edited by some authoritative body. The looseness with which the curved line is used to represent a tie, a slur or a phrase-mark is alone enough to justify the suggestion. An excellent example may be found in the subject of the fugue of Mendelssohn's second Sonata. If the slurs are observed as phrase-marks, the passage becomes absurd. To the careful student the musical sentence becomes clear enough, and he will punctuate it as the composer no doubt intended it. Or, to take an earlier example, the subject of the fugue in A major by J. S. Bach is often stated in a manner not only quite foreign to what must obviously have been the composer's intention, but against the instinct of any real musician.

A point closely allied to phrasing is clear repetition of reiterated notes, and it is important here to distinguish between the actual raising of the hand, and the more subtle 'finger-repetition' which is much more difficult to acquire. The works of Bach are full of examples, to mention only one composer, and the earnest student will never permit himself to lapse in this matter. Enough has been said to show the importance of Dr. Harding's lecture, containing as it does so much that is suggestive, and we hope his paper will be issued in a convenient form and thus fall into the hands of those most likely to profit by his well-timed criticisms.

A new two-manual organ has been erected at Lismore Cathedral, Co. Waterford, by Messrs. Telford & Telford, of Dublin. It replaces a former one of theirs which, for over seventy years, had been much admired for its tone. The new organ has 21 stops—17 speaking, 3 couplers and wind signal—tremulant, 3 composition pedals, and swell pedal. The old oak case and some of the pipes have been retained. The tone is very full, soft and rich; the voicing of the various stops and the balance of tone is most satisfactory. The pedals are radiating and concave; the front pipes are in aluminium and gold, and present a fine and very effective appearance. The work was carried out under the advice of the Cathedral organist, Mr. Mervyn Archdale Browne.

SPECIAL SERVICES.

On June 17, at the dedication and opening of the organ recently presented to All Saints' Church, Maidstone, by Mr. E. G. Meers, Mus. Bac., the donor gave a recital. Mendelssohn's Sonata in F and Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor were items. The organ was designed by Mr. John W. Whiteley, and built by Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper (Liverpool).

The Wakefield District Organists' Association visited Nottingham on July 1, to hear the Albert Hall organ recently presented by Sir Jesse Boot. Mr. Bernard Johnson gave a recital; his programme included Toccata and Fugue in C, Bach, 'The Ride of the Valkyries,' Wagner, and Overture of 'The Meistersingers.'

We have received reports of various Coronation Thanksgivings held in Calcutta. St. John's Church had the forethought to arrange to give some of the music used at the London Coronation. Sir Frederick Bridge's Homage Anthem was included.

JOHANNESBURG, TRANSVAAL.

A recital of 'Coronation Music' took place on Coronation Day, June 22, in St. Mary's Church. The programme included a good deal of the music which had been performed in Westminster Abbey that morning. Mr. Deane presided at the organ. A fanfare on the timpani, as there were no brass instruments available, was played by Mrs. Deane, the organ accompanying. In a letter, Mrs. Deane says:

"You will see we tried to do our best to celebrate the Coronation 'musically.' We had a very fine service in the morning, attended by the mayor and foreign consuls, &c., in state, and King George V. was duly proclaimed. Then came the Acclamation, and my husband and I played the 'fanfare' on organ and timpani (we could get no trumpeters—all were engaged on military duties). I felt very honoured, and wondered whether any other ladies had 'drummed' in King George. Mr. Deane asks me to offer his congratulations upon the Novello centenary. We have dear Vincent Novello's 'Life' in our library, also Mrs. Cowden-Clarke's 'My long life,' and we know them both by heart. We also possess a letter from Vincent Novello to my husband's father, written at Craven Hill in 1844."

There was a large attendance, the congregation being most interested and attentive.

Special musical services were held at the Parish Church of Brighton during the Patronal Festival week, June 25—July 2. On June 25, Stanford's Te Deum in B flat, and Stainer's anthem 'Sing a song of praise' were sung at matins, and Garrett's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in E flat at evensong. On June 26, Mr. Chastey Hector gave an organ recital. His programme included Mendelssohn's D minor Sonata and Schumann's Fugue in B flat on the name 'Bach.' On June 28, a Service of Praise was held. The Brighton Parish Church Festival Choir, under the conductorship of Mr. Chastey Hector, the organist and choirmaster, sang Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' and Handel's 'Hallelujah Chorus.' On June 29 (St. Peter's Day) there was a choral eucharist, at which Merbecke's plainsong was sung by a choir of ladies' voices, and at evensong the full choir took part in Lloyd in A (Magnificat and Nunc dimittis), and César Franck's '150th Psalm.' The Festival was concluded on July 2, when there was a choral eucharist sung to Calkin in G. Elgar's 'Ave Verum,' Stainer's 'Pater Noster' and 'Sevenfold Amen' were also used. At the close of evensong, Martin's Te Deum in A, with organ and timpani, was given by the Parish Church Festival Choir. Crowded congregations were present, and collections were taken throughout the Festival for the Willis organ, formerly in the Hampstead Conservatoire, which was recently erected in the church to the memory of the late King Edward VII.

The official Coronation service at St. James's Cathedral, Toronto, on June 22, was in point of musical excellence one of the finest that has ever been heard in Toronto. St. James's choir, under the direction of Dr. Albert Ham, has for years had an enviable reputation, and on this occasion surpassed all previous efforts. The musical part of the services was a modified form of that used at Westminster Abbey. It included Tallis's setting of the Litany, and the Homage anthem 'Rejoice in the Lord, O ye righteous' (Sir Frederick Bridge). Dr. Ham's Coronation anthem, 'The King shall rejoice,' was most impressive. It was written especially for the service at St. James's, and sung in practically every cathedral and parish church of account in Canada for the first time on the day of the Coronation. The volunteers were Percy Godfrey's 'Coronation march' and Dr. Ham's Marche militaire, 'Canada,' for full orchestra. Mr. F. G. Killmaster presided at the organ with his usual ability.

On June 27, at Durham Castle, Mr. Richard Runciman Terry, who has been organist and director of the music at Westminster Roman Catholic Cathedral since 1901, was presented with an Honorary Mus. Doc. Degree bestowed by the Durham University. Principal W. H. Hadow, Mus. Doc., in introducing Mr. Terry to the Convocation, said: 'The renaissance of English music, which has come in so full a flood during the lifetime of the present generation, has brought forth with it a considerable advance in the methods of musical criticism and scholarship. One result of this advance, perhaps the most notable, has been a wider knowledge of those great composers through whom, from the beginning of Henry VIII.'s reign to the end of the Elizabethan age, England had some right to claim the musical primacy of Europe. For over two centuries our nation allowed this past glory to fall into oblivion; to our day belongs the honour of restoring it to its due place in our national history. To this end have contributed the talent and industry of many scholars; there is none among them to whom we are more indebted than he whom I am privileged to present to you this afternoon. A musician of great learning, of fine scholarship, and of impeccable taste, he has devoted the last fifteen years of his life to discovering and bringing to light forgotten masterpieces. Most of them, when he began his work, existed only in part-books and other manuscript collections; their beauties wasted in disuse, their very titles unknown save to a few antiquaries and historians. He has rescued them from their long neglect, he has made them once more a part of our common heritage, and in so doing has earned the grateful recognition of all who care for the dignity and renown of English music. I therefore present to you Richard Runciman Terry, that he may receive the degree of Doctor of Music honoris causa."

Sir Joseph Barnby's cantata 'Rebekah,' with orchestral accompaniment, was performed on July 2 at the Aylestone Road Wesleyan Church, Leicester, under the direction of Mr. Jethro R. Orgill. The soloists were, Miss Florence Jarvis, Mr. Alfred Page, and Mr. Philip Wigginton. Mr. A. W. Kerridge presided at the organ, and Mr. J. H. Vann led the orchestra.

Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' was given at St. John the Baptist's Church, Great Marlborough Street, on July 18. Miss Amy Tyndale and Mr. Arthur Drew were soloists, Mr. Cecil Montague played the organ, and Mr. Martin Matthews conducted.

A performance was given at Downham Parish Church on July 18. The programme included 'Zadok the Priest' (Handel), Elgar's new 'Offertorium,' Bridge's Homage Anthem, and Edward German's Coronation March. Mr. E. Harold Melling was organist and musical director.

The North-Eastern Cathedral Choir Association, which for nearly forty years has held annual gatherings, met this year at York, on July 20. The choirs of York, Durham and Ripon and their respective organists took part. A series of representative anthems was given. It included Crotch's 'Sing we merrily,' Ouseley's 'O Saviour of the world,' S. S. Wesley's 'Cast me not away,' C. V. Stanford's 'The Lord is my Shepherd.' The canticles were sung to Mr. Tertius Noble's setting in A minor. Dr. Armes's processional hymn 'Hail! festival Day' was used. Miss MacLagan (daughter of the Archbishop of York) contributed a chant for the Psalm, and the offertory hymn was sung to a tune by the Rev. A. Culley, the organist of Durham Cathedral. The organ accompaniments were shared by Mr. Culley and Mr. C. H. Woods (Ripon), and Mr. T. Tertius Noble conducted.

ORGAN RECITALS.

- Mr. Albert Orton, Walton-on-the-Hill Parish Church, Liverpool—Prelude and Fugue in G major, Bach: Overture 'Ruy Blas,' Mendelssohn. Second Recital.—Basso Ostinato in D, Arensky.

SONGS.

- Mirage. Should one of us remember.* By W. H. Reed.
Jesu, lover of my soul. Sacred song. By H. W. Wareing.
If but 'twere mine. By J. D. Davis.
O dreamy, gloomy, friendly trees. By Joseph Holbrooke.
The Camel's hump. Words by Rudyard Kipling. Music by Edward German.
Walter before the Masters' Guild. Walter's trial song.
Walter's prize song. From 'Die Meistersinger.' Stiegmund's love-song. From 'Die Walküre.' By Richard Wagner.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

A decided gift of lyrical writing is displayed in the two songs by Mr. Reed. 'Mirage' is a thoughtful setting of a Rossetti poem, and although the syncopated chords of the accompaniment are a device much abused in a lower class of song, the expression of the music is on a high plane. In 'Should one of us remember,' the composer has caught the jocular spirit of the words, which again are verses by Rossetti, and cleverly reproduced it in music, with some originality and quaintness in his harmonic ideas and form of accompaniment.

The sacred song by Mr. Wareing is placidly Victorian, with a voice-part and violin obbligato that elegantly intertwine and respond. Its simplicity and melodiousness will appeal to many.

Mr. Davis's 'If but 'twere mine,' to words by G. Hubi-Newcombe, is a little more sophisticated. It moves quietly and smoothly over a wide range of tonality, while the vocal part pursues a graceful sinuous path.

Both Mr. Herbert Trench the poet and Mr. Holbrooke the composer dwell more upon the dreaminess and gloom than upon the friendliness of the trees addressed in their most recent joint effort. The harmonies are of the soul-searching type, but are highly effective and bear the stamp of an original and inventive mind.

The union of Mr. Kipling's words and Mr. German's music has been shown before to be a perfect match. 'The Camel's hump' is a further instance of their affinity. Both words (from the 'Just so' song-book) and music are 'catchy,' in the manner of which only these collaborators possess the secret. The song is certain to 'go down.'

The publication of the three tenor lyrics from 'Die Meistersinger' in a handy form, with a new and adequate English version by Mr. Rothery, provides a boon for which many English singers will be glad. It is unnecessary to expatiate on the merits of these songs, or on those of Siegmund's love-song, which is equally deserving of the enhanced popularity which it will doubtless gain from this edition.

Dictionary-Catalogue of Operas and Operettas which have been performed on the public stage. Compiled by John Towers, Acme Publishing Co., Morgantown, W. Va.

This is a stupendous monument of the wonderful industry of one man. We have delayed giving a review in order, as occasion arose, to test its completeness and accuracy, and so far we have found the information correct. The book consists of 1,046 large and closely printed pages; 28,015 operas and operettas are catalogued. Part I. (688 pp.) gives an alphabetical list of operas with the composers' names, nationality and year of birth and death. Part II. (191 pp.) similarly indexes composers and lists of their works. Part III. gives an alphabetical list of libretti, with the number of times each has been set to music for a public lyric stage. 'Alessandro nelle Indie' has had the honour of being set sixty-four times! We are ashamed to say we have not heard it once! In his valditory message Mr. Towers says that he began this monumental compilation on April 3, 1893, when he was fifty-eight years old, and that he finished the work when he was seventy-three years old. He may now congratulate himself upon the undoubted usefulness of his labours. In such a work, crammed with dates and details, it is probable that there are errors. But be this as it may, the volume affords astonishing information, not, so far as we are aware, to be obtained in one cover in any language, and it will no doubt become a standard book of reference.

Six Songs. By Edmondstone Duncan. Op. 114.
[The Vincent Music Company.]

Artistic intentions count for much in musical composition, and the intentions of Mr. Edmondstone Duncan, as revealed in this group of songs, are of the highest. His method is that of suiting the matter and design of his music entirely to the changing significance of the text, and he carries it into effect by a constant shifting of the harmonic ground and a somewhat vague thematic outline. The restlessness may not appeal to all, but it is employed in a way that denotes conviction and sincerity and with high musicianship. The mood of unsatisfied longing conveyed at many points may not seem on the whole characteristic of the poems, but it is, as it seems, adopted by the composer with full belief in its appropriateness. The words are familiar, they consist of Sir Philip Sidney's 'My true love hath my heart,' Shelley's 'I arise from dreams of thee,' William Blake's 'My silks and fine array,' Thomas Campion's 'Give beauty all her right,' Sidney's 'O words which fall like summer dew,' Sir William Davenant's 'The lark now leaves his wat'ry nest.' No one of the settings can be said to be superior to the others, for all are of distinct originality and embody ideas of unmistakable beauty.

The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis. Set to music in the key of D major. By W. Ernest Jennings.

[S. Rose & Co., Fort Bombay.]

Colonel Jennings has succeeded in producing an easy and in some respects attractive setting of the evening Canticles, which would appeal to small choirs. We are reminded more than once of Turle in D, but can readily excuse the allusion. A modulation earlier in the Magnificat would have given some variety, as the key has been quite sufficiently established. If the parts are a little wanting in contrapuntal movement, compensation is perhaps gained by the simplicity of the writing. The atmosphere is quite that of Church music, and the organ part, by reason of being purely made up of the vocal parts, is well within the powers of an average player who understands the importance of note-values.

MACFARREN'S 'CHEVY CHASE' OVERTURE.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—I see it stated in the review of Wagner's autobiography in your July number that Wagner 'admired the peculiar, wildly passionate character' of Macfarren's 'Chevy Chase' overture, and 'enjoyed conducting it.'

Of the same work, Mendelssohn wrote to Macfarren that when he heard it in London he 'liked it very much,' and after a performance of it in Leipzig in 1834, again wrote: 'Your overture went very well, and was most cordially and unanimously received by the public, the orchestra playing it with true delight and enthusiasm.'

Would it not be interesting to have a revival of a composition which favourably impressed two great musicians so differently constituted as Mendelssohn and Wagner?—Yours faithfully,

H. W. W.

Aberdeen, July 5, 1911.

WHO COMPOSED THE GREATEST NUMBER OF OPERAS?

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—With a view of settling this vexed question, and of putting an end to further misunderstanding on the subject, I venture to send you a list of composers who composed 100 operas and upwards. There are others closely following on their heels, so to say; but this list will suffice to answer the inquiry heading this missive, and may prove of some little value to those interested in such details:

No.	Composer.	Nationality.
166.	Wenzel Mueller.	(1767-1835.) Austrian.
149.	Antonio Draghi.	(1635-1700.) Italian.
145.	Niccolò Piccinni.	(1728-1800.) Italian.
123.	Giovanni Paisiello.	(1741-1816.) Italian.
114.	Pietro Guglielmo.	(1727-1804.) Italian.
109.	Baldassare Galuppi.	(1706-1785.) Italian.
103.	Jacques Offenbach.	(1819-1880.) German (?).
102.	Henry Bishop.	(1786-1855.) English.

Average age, a fraction under seventy-one years.

Yours faithfully,

JOHN TOWERS,

[Unhappy Compiler of a 'Dictionary of Operas.']

Morgantown, West Va.

THE ORIGIN OF THE WORDS OF 'LORD, FOR THY TENDER MERCIES' SAKE.'

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—It may interest your querist 'G. W. B.' to know that what is probably the origin of the words of the above well-known anthem will be found in 'Christian Prayers and Holy Meditations, as well for Private as Public Exercise; collected by Henry Bull [A.D. 1566]. Reprinted for the Parkes Society for the publication of the works of the Fathers and early writers of the Reformed English Church. 12mo. 1842.

The words (p. 174) are as follow: 'For Thy tender mercy sake lay not my sins to my charge, but forgive that is past; and give me grace to amend my life, to decline from sin, and incline to virtue, that I may walk with an upright heart, a clean conscience, and single eye before Thee this day (or night), and evermore.'

Henry Bull is described by Antony à Wood as a native of Warwickshire, and a Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, and zealous for reformation in King Edward VI.'s days. He was expelled from his fellowship and exiled in the reign of Queen Mary, but returned to England and held some benefices under Queen Elizabeth, dying about 1575. There is no sufficient ground to attribute any of the prayers in this collection to him as author. We may conclude that they were, as described on the title-page to an edition of 1570, 'Gathered out of the most Godly learned in our time, by H. B.' His name appears in full in later editions. The section of the book containing the words of the anthem in question seems to have been compiled by J. Lydley, or Ludlowe.—Yours faithfully, JOHN S. BUMPUS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—Re your answer to 'G. W. B.' in the Musical Times for July: the words of Farrant's anthem 'Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake' are taken in a modified form from a book published in 1568 entitled 'Christian Prayers and Holy Meditations.'—Yours faithfully,

Obituary.

The death of FELIX MOTTI, which occurred at Munich on July 2, has removed, in the fulness of his activities, one of the world's great conductors. He first became known to fame as conductor of the Vienna Richard Wagner Verein, a post which he owed to a distinguished career at the Conservatorium. In 1876, at the age of twenty, he came under the favourable notice of Wagner, and was appointed stage-conductor at Bayreuth during the first performances of 'Der Ring.' Wagner was so strongly impressed with Motti's ability that in 1879 he earnestly recommended him to Angelo Neumann of the Leipzig Theatre as an assistant-conductor to Nikisch and Seidl. In 1881 he was appointed conductor of the Grand-Ducal Opera House at Karlsruhe, and from that time till 1903 he carried on his duties with such conspicuous success that he earned European fame for himself and raised Karlsruhe into a musical centre of importance. His chief energies were naturally devoted to the works of Wagner, but he also displayed a strong predilection for those of Berlioz, all of whose operas he produced. In 1886 he conducted 'Tristan and Isolde' at Bayreuth. He also held important posts at Berlin and Munich, where he was director of the Academy and conductor of the Mozart cycles at the Residenz Theatre. His first visit to London occurred in 1894, when he conducted a series of Wagner concerts. In 1898 he conducted three cycles of the 'Ring' at Covent Garden. Motti devoted some time to composition, and his opera 'Agnes Bernauer' met with considerable success. His other works include the operas 'Ramin' and 'Fürst und Sanger,' a Festspiel 'Eberstein' and the Tanzspiel 'Pan im Busch.'

With reference to the conflicting statements made as to whether the late Herr Motti had any share in the first production of 'Parsifal' at New York, we have received the following letter from Mr. Sidney L. Loeb:

'DEAR MR. LOEB,—It is an absolute fact that Motti had nothing, whatever to do either with the preparation or with the conducting of a performance of "Parsifal" at New York. The staging was under the late Lautenschlager, the mise-en-scène under Anton Fuchs, both from Munich, and the musical direction was entirely in my hands.

Yours very truly,
'ALFRED HERTZ.'

It is stated that the deceased musician bequeathed his fine library, also autographs by Haydn and Beethoven, to the city of Vienna. Autographs by Hummel are bequeathed to that composer's native city.

At 15, Hamilton Terrace, London, N.W., on July 16, LOUISE, wife of Mr. William Shakespeare, died after a long illness, patiently borne. Much sympathy is felt with Mr. Shakespeare in his bereavement.

We offer also sincere sympathy to Dr. MONK, organist of Truro Cathedral, whose wife died on July 9.

THE NOVELLO CENTENARY.

Innumerable notices of our Centenary supplement (issued with our June number) and congratulations have reached us. It is impossible to acknowledge them all and to thank the writers. We give below a selection of those received from distant parts.

MESSRS. NOVELLO & Co., LTD.

DEAR SIRS,—Very many thanks for the copy of the Musical Times for June and the Novello Centenary supplement. I have not made use of the 'order form,' as I am already a subscriber to the paper, have been for nearly eleven years, and intend to be for the rest of my life. I am certain that I am one amongst thousands and thousands of others who daily realise what an enormous amount of good 'Novello' has done all over the world in publishing cheap and splendid music. I feel sure that they have now attained as high a position as is possible in their business, after years of hard work, pluck, opposition, &c., and they deserve, and have got, the sincere appreciation and admiration of every man, woman and child to whom the Art of music is sacred and dear.

Accept my congratulations for all the work you have done. You have come out 'brilliantly' at the top, and I wish for the firm an endless amount of success.

In visiting your offices on several occasions I have always been shown the greatest amount of attention and kindness, and have received much help at your hands, with advice.

Thanking you for all such past attention and kindness,

I remain, Dear Sirs,
Yours sincerely,
C. B. DIGNUM.

Late organist and choirmaster St. Michael's Church, now acting-organist Coke Church.

MESSRS. NOVELLO & Co., LTD.

DEAR SIRS,—I cannot let this opportunity pass without adding my congratulations to the many you must have received on your firm's centenary.

As one who has known your firm for nearly forty years, you can imagine it is an event of no small interest to me, not the less, now that I find myself labouring at a distance of 4,000 miles from Wardour Street.

It was, I doubt not, a result of the enterprise of your firm that I last month heard a performance by 250 voices of Spohr's 'Last Judgment,' given in a worthy manner in the city of Prince Albert 300 miles north from here, on the banks of the Saskatchewan river, and I should like to assure you that the familiar brown design of Novello's 'Paper Covers' is as well known and appreciated over these boundless western prairies as it is in the parlours of Queen's Hall.

With best wishes for your firm's continued prosperity,

Yours faithfully,
F. LAUBACH.

THE CORONATION CHOIR AND ORCHESTRA.

SUPPLEMENTARY LIST.

The following are additions to and corrections of the lists given in our July issue, pp. 434-437.

Gentlemen who assisted in various ways :

R. Chanter	E. S. Roper
Avalon Collard	Mr. E. Rose
Sir Homewood Crawford	Rev. H. Ross
Rev. H. C. de Lafontaine	Mr. Tewson
A. Mapleson	Mr. Whittaker
H. Raxworthy	Mr. W. D. Wilson

Under the Royal Collegiate Chapel of St. Katharine, read A. E. V. Taylor instead of Arthur Bond.

Add to sopranos: St. Andrew's, Wells Street, Carl A. J. Oecken, Vernon G. Weedon.

On July 2 a complimentary dinner was given at the Hotel Cecil by the Coronation Choir to Sir Frederick Bridge, M.V.O., Director of Music at the ceremony in Westminster Abbey. The Duke of Devonshire, who presided, read the following message from the King, received that day :

'His Majesty wishes it to be made known to the Westminster Abbey Choir, as well as to Sir Frederick Bridge, that he was very much pleased with the musical arrangements in the Abbey on the occasion of his Coronation, and that he thought that the music was beautiful and extremely well rendered.'

(Signed) KNOLLYS.

About two hundred were present. In his speech the Duke of Devonshire referred to the fact that Sir Frederick had officiated at three historic ceremonies, namely the Jubilee of Queen Victoria, the Coronation of King Edward, and the Coronation of King George. On behalf of the choir, he presented Sir Frederick with a handsome silver salver, as a memento of the great occasion.

Sir Frederick, who seemed to be affected by the warmth and geniality of his reception, said that Johnson had stated that it behoved every man as he advanced in years to keep his friendships in repair. He hoped and believed he had been able to do this. He thanked the choir for their splendid work, and the composers who had so loyally assisted him and were so responsive to his request that they would cut it short. He also expressed his sense of the excellence of the work of Dr. Alcock, who sat so long in the 'Alcock' pit extemporising fanfares and all kinds of fillings-in at a moment's notice. They would understand him when he said that he hoped he would never have to officiate at a third Coronation. He desired especially to thank Sir Walter Parratt, to whom he had to come so often for advice and assistance. Sir Frederick told the story of two old ladies who were in the cloisters at the Abbey. The vacuum cleaner was at work, and one lady said to the other, 'Isn't that splendid. It's Sir Frederick at the organ.' 'No,' said the other, 'he can't play like that; it must be Sir Walter Parratt.' On Coronation Day, Sir Walter at lunch-time had very much admired an engraving of the interior of the Abbey which hung in one of his (Sir Frederick's) rooms. He was happy to-day to be able to present Sir Walter with a framed copy of this engraving as a memento of the work in which they had co-operated.

Lord Alverstone (the Lord Chief Justice) moved a vote of thanks to the Duke of Devonshire, which was very heartily responded to. Mr. Galloway referred to the ability with which the choir had been served by its officials and all others concerned. Sir Walter Parratt, in responding to a toast, made an excellent speech, in the course of which he said that it was true that he was asked for advice, but he (Sir Walter) always took care to advise Sir Frederick to do what he knew he wanted to do. Both Sir Frederick and Sir Walter made special reference to the services of Mr. Henry King, the Choir secretary.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

THE RUSSIAN BALLET.

The proceedings at the Royal Opera, Covent Garden, during the past month have not been strictly confined to opera. A return has been made to a custom in which our grandfathers and great-grandfathers delighted, namely, the employment of a ballet in connection with the operatic series. Whole evenings of ballet have been supplied, and the public has responded well in spite of an enhanced price-list and a reduced free list. The engagement of the Russian Imperial Ballet, or of such portion of it as was sufficient for the purpose, has provided a variety to the programme which in view of its somewhat restricted character might otherwise have been lacking. One thing in the ballet's favour is its high efficiency. All the pieces have either music that has been specially written for them or else they have been specially written to existing music. A notable example is found in the dances—a most charming series—provided to Schumann's 'Carnaval.' The success with which the various pas have been fitted to this famous war-horse of the pianist shows that its rhythmic foundation is sound. Terpsichorean ornamentation is also provided to a series of the valse and mazurkas of Chopin under the title of 'Les Sylphides'; and Weber's 'L'Invitation à la Valse' has once again been pressed into the service of the dancer to provide a pretty pas de deux termed 'Le Spectre de la Rose.' As a fully-fledged and it may be added full-blooded ballet the 'Cléopâtre' of Arensky has been mounted, and it has proved the superior of the somewhat archaic 'Pavillon d'Armide' or the barbaric 'Prince Igor.' With regard to the last it is somewhat to be regretted that, following the precedent established by a famous equestrian impresario, the singing has been cut in order to come to the dancing. Borodine's music is really very interesting as an example of unadulterated, or, as he would have termed it, organically pure Russian music. A separate orchestra has been employed for the purposes of the ballet, but with no special advantage, since the permanent Royal Opera orchestra is of so much excellence.

OPERA.

In the direction of opera there has been little of note accomplished save a due sequence of familiar works. The most notable feature has been the revival of Gounod's 'Roméo et Juliette,' after a pause of five years. The only reason for the prolongation of the suspension of a once popular work would seem to be the absence of a tenor who could sing the music with some representation of its lyric value. Such a singer has been found in M. Franz, who appeared in one or two operas last year, and with commendable foresight was re-engaged for this season. In association with Madame Melba he has succeeded in gaining a full measure of such favour as a not very enthusiastic audience has bestowed upon the efforts of the singers. Signor Marcoux made a resonant Friar, and the other characters were on a general level. Madame Melba all through the season, as well as in this opera, has sung with very great charm, and the fact makes her departure to her native land all the more regrettable. Subsequently M. Franz appeared in Charpentier's delightful opera 'Louise' with good effect. Further additions to the répertoire have consisted of Bellini's 'La Sonnambula,' with Madame Tetrassini as a well-equipped exponent of the music of Amina—a part no longer sought as formerly as the one vehicle for the proof of a new soprano's powers. Excellent work was done in offering Bellini's grateful phrases by Mr. John McCormack, who shows an advance, and by Mr. Edmund Burke, who seems capable of a great deal more than he is trusted to do. There has been the annual airing of Meyerbeer's 'Gli Ugonotti,' with an 'all-star' cast, comprising Madame Tetrassini, Madame Destinn, M. Darmel (a new-comer), M. Huberdeau, and M. Sibirakoff, a new Russian bass of disappointing profundity. The airing process has brought with it the usual discovery of mildew spots by people who show no interest in the development of an art, and therefore fail to recognise that this 'well-worn' and 'old-fashioned' work is a prominent milestone on the operatic road. Some additions have been made to the rather meagre list of singers, but they have in no way altered the unstimulating character of the season. Mlle. Roggero, a pretty personage with a voice to match, made a brief appearance in 'Pagliacci,' given as a prelude to a ballet, and Mlle. Lipkovska has taken part in two operas, without, however, making the absence of Mlle. Kousnietzoff, in whose stead she was engaged, any less deplorable. Mlle. Lipkovska appeared in 'La Bohème,' with Signor Bassi as the lover, and also created the character of Suzanne, whose secret, forming the subject of Signor Wolff-Ferrari's short opera, provided an audience, assembled to witness the ballet, with a pleasant fifty minutes. This little work—'Susanna's Secret,' an interlude of one scene—has great charm. It is found not so much in the originality of its themes—for that could be contested—as in the grace of their presentation. There is an animation of style which, had it the individuality, might be described as modern Mozart. Susanna's secret is her cigarette. Newly-wed, her husband—the period is in the forties—is ignorant of the fact that his bride is a devotee to the cigarette. He smells tobacco in her boudoir and in her hair, and from the wreaths of smoke fashions a lover and rival. He accuses Susanna, but she, mistaking his reproaches for condemnation of her habit, pays little attention. His common-sense declines as his temper rises, and, after having inflicted severe damage on the new furniture and completely spoiled his umbrella, he leaves Susanna alone to her devices. She immediately consoles herself with a cigarette, and the husband returning discovers the truth. Their differences are at once settled, and the curtain falls on their mutual indulgence in the obnoxious thing with the full concurrence of their butler, who, having seen the couple safely out of the room, lights his own cigarette. Mlle. Lipkowska made a captivating Susanna, Signor Sammarco was excellent as the irascible husband, and was artistic even when smashing the furniture; and a very clever piece of miming was done by M. Ambroisiny as the butler who maintains perfect silence. Signor Campanini conducted.

The season of German opera at Covent Garden in October and November will be under the musical direction of Dr. Hans Richter. The works to be given will be the 'Ring,' 'Tristan und Isolde,' 'Der Fliegende Holländer,' 'Tannhäuser,' 'Lohengrin,' and Humperdinck's 'Königskinder.'

PRODUCTION OF M. MASSENET'S 'THAÏS.'

The latest addition to the répertoire within the scope of the present review was the first production in England of M. Massenet's seventeen-year-old opera of 'Thaïs.' To a very considerable extent the work is thoroughly representative of the composer: there is all the religious mysticism associated with his gifts of musical expression. The story, however, deals with mysticism. It is in a vision that Athanaël, a Cenobite settled with a few companions in the Egyptian desert, sees Thaïs, the famous actress of old Alexandria, and is moved to convert her from paganism to Christianity. He proceeds to Alexandria to carry out his work of conversion, and through the offices of his friend Nicias, who is at the moment the protector of Thaïs, he makes known his mission. His advances are rejected, but in one of the most attractive scenes of the opera it is made clear that his efforts are not without their good fruit. Finally Thaïs is converted, and makes her way into the desert with Athanaël, after having taken leave of her friends and admirers at a characteristic moment when, according to the stage direction, Nicias is 'slightly intoxicated.' He, however, secures their safe passage by distributing gold broadcast amongst the people, who resent the departure of their favourite. Overcome with fatigue Thaïs is left in the desert in the charge of the White Nuns and Athanaël returns to his brethren. But the personal attractiveness of his convert has exercised its fascination, and he returns to Thaïs to confess his earthly love. It is she, however, who has realised the joys of something more than a material existence, and dies before his eyes thoroughly converted from the life he invites her to lead again. The most important moments in the opera are found in the scenes between Thaïs and Athanaël, and to both the composer has assigned passages of considerable weight. He shows much resource in their construction, and does not hesitate to employ the methods and sometimes the phraseology of Wagner when it suits him. Nevertheless the fact that the story is not well-told seems to have disconcerted the composer. There is little in his music that can be frankly termed inspired. Effective passages for Athanaël, a somewhat Gounodish 'Meditation,' which is the chief indication of the conversion of Thaïs, and a detailed ballet, do not afford sufficient diversity to make the opera wholly acceptable to an English audience of the present day. In performance the work suffered somewhat from the sketchy nature of the representation of the chief characters. Madame Edvina betokened considerable ambition in undertaking the part of Thaïs, but proved herself scarcely equal to its demands. M. Gilly, an excellent artist, made a notable effort as Athanaël, which only failed in conviction because of his youth. M. Darnel was Nicias, and M. Verheyden the chief of the Cenobites. Other parts were taken by Miss Alys Mutch, Mlle. Wilna, and Mlle. Bourgeois. In the way of mounting and costumes the best was done, and Signor Panizza conducted with sympathy. The last stage of the season to be recorded is the production of the Russian ballet of Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Schéhérazade.' The whole series, in which ballet has clearly overshadowed opera, was to be brought to a close on July 31.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

A feature of the orchestral concert given by the students at Queen's Hall on July 11 was the prominent part played by tender youth. The Liszt Scholar, Mr. Vivian Langrish, has not yet emerged from boyhood, yet he was able to give a brilliant performance of so difficult a work as Mr. Matthay's Concert-piece in A minor (Op. 23) for pianoforte and orchestra. Still more remarkable was the violin playing of Master Willie Davies, a diminutive artist who bravely tackled the difficulties of the first movement of Elgar's Concerto. Without throwing new light on the music he gave an interpretation that was fresh by reason of its unsophisticated expression. His execution, although bearing traces here and there of juvenility, was admirable in its confidence and accuracy. His career as a violinist will be watched with interest. The usual standard of artistic efficiency was maintained by the other solo performers, who were Miss Nora W. Mackay, Miss Margaret Ismay, Mr. Wilson Thornton and Mr. Albert Brown (vocalists), Miss Phyllis Norman Parker (violinist), Miss Edith Penville (flautist), Miss Evelyn Cook (pianist) and Mr. Ambrose Gauntlett (violinist). Sir Alexander Mackenzie conducted.

The following Scholarships and Exhibition will be open for competition during September and October:—The Ross Scholarship of £67 for a male vocalist and the Ross Scholarship of £67 for a wood-wind player (open to students only); three Ada Lewis Scholarships for a soprano singer, a pianist and a violin or viola player (not open to students); the Josephine Troup Scholarship of £33 for a lady composer; the John Thomas Scholarship for an instrumentalist or vocalist, one of whose parents was born in Wales (not open to students of any Metropolitan institution); the Maud Mary Gooch Scholarship for an organist (age between fourteen and twenty-one, not open to students at the R.A.M., R.C.M., or G.S.M.); the Henry Smart Scholarship for a male organist and composer (age under twenty); a free open Scholarship for a flute or bassoon player; the Stainer Exhibition for the best student (of either sex) in organ playing admitted at the entrance examination on September 21. Particulars of the above competition may be obtained from the Secretary.

At the Annual Prize Distribution held at Queen's Hall on July 21, a short concert was given by students. The programme included part-songs for female voices by Frederick Corder and Sir Alexander Mackenzie, a Serenade for string orchestra by Victor Herbert, and a Concerto for four violins by Maurer. The Principal, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, delivered an address in which he reviewed the past year's work and made some important announcements as to the future. He said that for some time past the management had been concentrating attention upon the completion of a highly important educational scheme. It had long been patent to observant educationists that the musical education of children called for reform, particularly in the matter of ear-cultivation. Something had to be done to prevent the young thinking of music as a series of little black dots arranged in some rhythmical pattern which had to be played on an instrument before they conveyed any sort of meaning at all. The Associated Board of the Royal Academy and the Royal College of Music had therefore instituted a graduated series of examinations which will immediately come into operation. But the Academy itself was going much further. They had arranged for a series of lecture-lessons and demonstrations by recognised experts to be given as a special training course for teachers. The new curriculum was, in fact, a training in teaching. He would rather see a portion of the care which is now devoted to the eternal question of technique bestowed upon a need which had forced itself upon the attention of educationists. Sir Alexander mentioned with thankfulness the gift of valuable scores presented to the library by Miss Prendergast. He announced that the coveted medal offered by the Worshipful Company of Musicians to the most distinguished student of the year had been awarded to Miss Olive Turner, whose gifts as a singer, actress, dancer, pianist, and composer had earned this great distinction. The prize for exceptional industry had fallen to Miss Nellie Fulcher, who was a pianist, a violinist, a viola player, a timpanist, and a composer. The Mario prize was awarded to Mr. Wilson Thornton, and the Mrs. Burgess prize of £50 to Frank Ernest Osborne. He acknowledged with gratitude the gift of £250 from the R.A.M. Club. Referring to the vacating of the Tenterden Street premises, Sir Alexander said that all that has, for many years, been taught and founded there may fairly claim to have represented the movement of musical thought in this country. It was the errand of a school of this kind—in painter's language—to teach the bones and muscles as well as to keep pace with every new phase of the art. They did not mean to part with their traditions, but they would carry their household gods along with them. To-day seemed an occasion for cheerful anticipations, and he felt in no mood to end his remarks in any other spirit. But he earnestly hoped that this notable movement in the history of the Academy would be the occasion, the cause of a great and sympathetic drawing-together of its past and present students, a re-union of all its well-wishers in the country, to celebrate the new course of life it begins and cheer it on its way.

The Countess of Plymouth gave away the prizes.

We shall give more particulars of the new Art of Teaching scheme in our next issue.

The Royal Academy Club had a dinner on July 22. We regret we are unable to report the proceedings in our present issue.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The twenty-eighth Annual General Meeting of the Corporation was held on July 12; the President, H.R.H. Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein, took the chair.

The Annual Report of the Council having been read by Mr. Charles Morley, the President referred, as at the last general meeting, to the great loss sustained by the death of the Founder, King Edward VII., and expressed the gratitude they felt to His Majesty King George V. who had manifested his intention to continue his father's gracious interest in the College. In speaking of the Coronation Service, the President remarked that a large proportion of the works given, and those some of the most impressive, came from the pens of musicians intimately associated with the College. He spoke of the Reports presented by the outside examiners, and in particular that of Dr. Allen, who had expressed enthusiasm for the results of the recently established class for sight-reading. His Royal Highness claimed that the College had maintained its reputation by the high standard of the operatic performances, orchestral and chamber concerts; by the successful administration of the Patron's Fund; and by the continued successes won by past pupils. He mentioned the gift made to the College by the German Emperor of the published compositions of Prince Louis Ferdinand of Prussia, and other valuable donations that had been received.

The President then moved, and Mr. Lionel Benson seconded, the adoption of the Report; and His Royal Highness presented to pupils the gold and silver medals awarded during the year.

A vote of thanks to the President was proposed by Sir William E. Bigge and seconded by Mr. George A. Macmillan.

At the Chamber Concert given at the College on July 19, a new Sonata for violin and pianoforte, in A major, composed by Harold Darke, was performed by Mr. Philip Levine (violin) and the composer. The composition exhibited considerable constructive ability and elegant fancy. It is written in an idiom easy to follow, compared with much new music presented in these advanced times. It is to be hoped that it will be taken up by good performers.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

A number of students took part in the concert given at the College on July 3, and gave a practical demonstration of the utility of the teaching of this institution. The vocalists were Miss Dorothy Deathridge, Miss Margaret Bohane, Miss Alice E. Booth, and Miss Agnes Browning; the organists were Mr. George H. Skaer, Mr. Harold A. Wood, and Mr. Clifford Cartwright; and Miss Edith K. Bird and Miss Constance Martin played the pianoforte and violin respectively. The choral class was heard on the following day in the performance of Mendelssohn's 'Christus' and 'Loreley' and Hurlstone's Ballad for chorus and orchestra, 'Alfred the Great,' under the direction of Dr. H. T. Pringuer. The singing was spirited and excellent in tone and executive efficiency. Solo parts were taken by Miss Edith Davies, Miss Stella Farmer, Mr. J. Watts Dauntun, Mr. Frederick Woodhouse, and Mr. Sidney H. Sheppard. A further demonstration of the work of the College was given on July 10, when the artists who appeared included Miss Kathleen Lawler, Miss Florence Gass, Miss Eva Pocock, and Mr. Sidney H. Sheppard (vocalists), Miss Alice Lees, Miss Constance Martin, Miss Aileen Butler, and Miss Margaret Bradfield, and Master Samuel Kutcher (violinists), Miss Evelyn Smith and Mr. Harold Wood (pianists) and Mr. Harry Gray (organist).

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

The vitality of the work of the Guildhall School of Music is nowhere exhibited to better purpose than in the periodical concerts of the orchestral class. On July 7 this body gave at the City of London School, under the direction of Mr. Landon Ronald, an admirable performance of Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony. It was clean in execution, well graded and balanced in tone, and unified in phrasing. The spirit and efficiency of the orchestral students' training was further displayed in Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' suite and in the accompaniment to the Paganini-Wilhelmj Violin concerto in D major, in which Miss Rebe Kussmann was the soloist. Songs were given by Miss Lottie Minns.

SOCIETY OF WOMEN MUSICIANS.

An invitation meeting to inaugurate the Society of Women Musicians was held on Saturday, July 15, at the Women's Institute, 92, Victoria Street, S.W.—the Society consisting of Members (women) and Associates (men).

The chairman, Miss Katharine Eggar, in an opening address, laid before the audience the reasons which had led to the formation of the Society. While admitting that the mere fact no such Society already existed might not be sufficient grounds for calling one into being, she expressed the conviction that a strong body of high-principled women musicians might do a great deal to reform public opinion on music and raise the standard of musical politics. She then dealt with the avowed objects of the Society as printed in the Rules placed in the hands of the audience: These being, first, to establish a centre for the exchange of ideas, where experiments, methods, events and principles may be discussed and sifted; second, to give members the advantages of co-operation in the business side of their professional work and, when desired, advice; third, to bring composers and executants into touch and to afford composers practical opportunities for the trying-over of compositions,—which, the speaker pointed out, would not be the least of the services which the Society might render both to women and to the Art, as many a composer must be tempted to give up writing because of the hopelessness of ever having her works performed; and as, again, many must be writing less well than they might because of the impossibility of bringing the music they had written to the final test. The fourth object of the Society, which is 'to promote such other objects as may be deemed desirable by the Council for the advancement and extension of the Society's interests generally,' was, Miss Eggar said, rather more indefinite than the preceding three, but none the less important. It needed some imagination to fill in the details, but she believed that there was a great work for the Society to do in challenging musical conventions—in refusing to accept artificialities for realities; in refusing to submit to stupid abuses (such as the tyranny of noise under which we live), as if they were heaven-sent calamities of inscrutable origin; in trying to go to the root of the matter in artistic principles; to study the life of art rather than the accepted and perhaps worn-out forms.

In conclusion, she pointed out that there was one branch of creative art in which women had no past as they had in literature or painting, but, she believed, a tremendous future, namely that of musical composition; and she trusted that the Society might be the means of stimulating the imaginations of women to loftier flights in that atmosphere than they had at present attempted.

Miss Gertrude Eaton next spoke on the objects of the Women's Institute, with which the Society of Women Musicians is affiliated, and explained that members of the latter would have all the advantages of the Institute's many activities, including the use of its fine premises for their meetings.

Miss Marion Scott, to whom the foundation of the Society is due, and whose work both as a musician and an organizer is too well known to need comment, then read the Rules of the Society; and was followed by Miss Lucie Johnstone, who spoke with great enthusiasm of the possibilities of the Society, and amused the audience greatly by her account of some of the objections which had been urged against it.

The next speaker was Miss Emily Daymond, Mus. Doc., who eloquently enlarged upon and summed up the previous speeches, saying that she felt there was no limit to what such a Society might do both in practical reforms and in artistic developments if it were animated by such a spirit as had been shown all through that meeting. She warmly supported the scheme for discussing contemporary events and experiments, and the idea of co-operation in business matters. She added that though it was very desirable to join a Society after it had been working successfully for some time, there was no pleasure comparable to that of being in at the beginning.

Madame Liza Lehmann, Mrs. Stepney Rawson, and other ladies having continued the discussion, the resolution that 'the Rules as read be adopted' was carried unanimously with enthusiasm.

The meeting then proceeded to elect members of Council, the six members of the Musical Committee of the Women's Institute ex officio and the following members of the S.W.M.: Miss Ethel Barns, Miss Emily Daymond, Miss Katharine Eggar, Miss Adela Hamaton, Miss Lucie Johnstone, Madame Agnes Larkcom, Madame Liza Lehmann, Miss Florence Macnaughton, and the hon. officers (hon. secretary, Miss Katharine Eggar, hon. treasurer, Miss Gertrude Eaton; chairman of Council, Miss Marion Scott).

THE FESTIVAL OF EMPIRE.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The weekly patriotic concerts held at the Crystal Palace in connection with the Festival of Empire have continued with increasing interest to the end of the series. Sir Alexander Mackenzie conducted the Scottish concert given on June 20, and his 'Burns' Rhapsody was a conspicuous item on the programme; the remainder included MacCunn's 'Land of the mountain and the flood' Overture, Mr. William Wallace's symphonic poem 'Villon,' and songs contributed by Miss Carmen Hill and Mr. Robert Burnett. Choral singing was given by the Glasgow Select Choir, under the direction of Mr. George Taggart. Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor was conductor of the South African concert on June 27; the programme, to which Miss Ada Forrest, Mr. Albert Archdeacon and Miss Vera Poppe contributed, included Mr. Haverall Brian's overture and the conductor's Entr'acte to 'Nero,' 'For valour,' Mr. Hamilton Harty was very appropriately chosen to conduct the Irish concert on July 4, and with a rich musical store to draw from the programme was one of unusual interest. Real Irish songs and some original examples by Sir Charles Stanford were sung by Mr. Plunkett Greene and Mr. Joseph O'Mara. The chief orchestral pieces were Stanford's first Irish Rhapsody, Mr. Harty's 'Comedy Overture,' and Sullivan's overture 'Di ballo.' Unusual interest was imparted to the Welsh concert, given on July 11, by the presence of the well-known Rhymney United Choir, conducted by Mr. John Price. This body of singers was heard in 'Teyrnasoedd y Ddaer,' by Ambrose Lloyd and 'Efe a Ddaw,' by Mr. Price. The instrumental section of the programme, of which Mr. Edward German was conductor-in-chief, included his 'Welsh Rhapsody,' Dr. Walford Davies's 'Festal Overture,' and the 'Country-dance' from Mr. Harry Evans's cantata, 'Dafydd ap Gwilym,' which was conducted by the composer and was very successful. Welsh composers have not hitherto distinguished themselves by the creation of music for salutory purposes. Miss Dilys Jones and Mr. Ben Davies were the vocalists. The concluding concert of the Empire series was given on July 18, and conducted by Sir Frederic Cowen, and was labelled 'New Zealand.' The musical output of the island was represented by the Adagio ('A Maori lament') from Mr. Alfred Hill's Symphony in B flat, and two movements from Mr. Arnold Trowell's Violoncello concerto, with the composer as soloist. The other solo artists were Ranginia (a Maori), Madame Zela, Miss Mabel Manson, Miss Irene Ainsley (vocalists), and Miss Audrey Richardson (violinist). The programme included Sir Frederic Cowen's 'Butterfly's ball' Overture, and his second suite of Old English Dances.

On July 12, in connection with the Festival of Empire, a most interesting concert was given by a choir of some 1,500 girls drawn from the High Schools of London. In all, about fifty schools sent contingents of singers. Mr. S. Filmer Rook conducted, and Mr. Granville Humphreys presided at the organ. During an interval in the concert, Mr. Harcourt presented the prizes to the winners in the choral competitions held earlier in the day. The details are reported in our COMPETITION FESTIVAL RECORD.

The full programme is given in the School Music Review.

NONCONFORMIST CHOIR UNION.

The twenty-third annual Festival of the Nonconformist Choir Union, which was held at the Crystal Palace on July 1, was the most successful that has taken place under these auspices and one of the most striking of recent events of its kind. There was an unusually large audience. Under the direction of Mr. Frank Idle, who greatly enhanced his reputation as a choral conductor, the following works were sung by the choir of 4,000 voices:

Hymn ...	'O King of kings' ...	Tallis
Anthem ...	'By Babylon's wave' ...	Gounod
Chorus ...	'God so loved the world' ...	Stainer
Anthem ...	'Blessing, Glory, Wisdom' ...	A.H. Brewer
Chorus (male voices) ...	'The Lord is a Man of War' ...	Handel
Chorus ...	'But as for His people' ...	Handel
Part-song ...	'O peaceful night' ...	German
Part-song ...	'My sweet sweetening' ...	H. F. Simon
Part-song ...	'The long day closes' ...	Sullivan
Part-song ...	'Now is my Chloris' ...	Idle
Chorus ...	'It comes from the misty ages' ...	Elgar

Every direction of choral excellence possible to so large a body of singers brought together under such conditions was indicated in the singing, which reflected the highest credit upon all who were concerned. The programme also included vocal solos by Miss Carrie Tubb. The organist was Mr. J. A. Neale, and his assistant was Mr. Leonard C. F. Robson. The deputy conductors were Mr. Granville Humphreys and Mr. Charles Rowley.

London Concerts.

MR. IVIMEY'S CONCERT.

Well-known, through his able direction of the Strolling Players' Orchestral Society, as a resourceful conductor, Mr. Joseph Ivimey made a claim to higher attributes by means of a concert given at Queen's Hall, on June 19, when the London Symphony Orchestra came under his control. The chief work in the programme was Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony, with which practically every conductor of note has at some time shown his worth. Mr. Ivimey, to his credit, did not emulate the hysterical emotion with which others treat, or maltreat the work, but placed the music first and his own personality at its service. He brought out the most notable of its characteristics, which lie in the rhythm, and so controlled the sentiment that the interpretation as a whole was both dignified and telling. Mr. Ivimey was no less successful in the task of directing the accompaniment to Beethoven's Violin concerto, in which Herr Kreisler was the soloist. He also conducted the 'Meistersinger' Overture. The occasion served to reveal Mr. Ivimey as a conductor whose abilities deserve to be exercised in a higher sphere than his work has usually occupied.

MR. HADLEY'S CONCERT.

Although one of the chief forward spirits among the younger American composers, Mr. Henry Hadley has not yet become familiar to English audiences. The concert of his works given at Queen's Hall on June 28 was, however, highly successful, and probably serves as the foundation for his future esteem in this country. Of the works performed the tone-poem 'Salome' alone had been heard in London before, having been introduced at a Promenade Concert. The chief novelty was his fourth Symphony, entitled 'North, East, South, and West,' one point of the compass being assigned to each movement. Although Mr. Hadley is a master of the orchestra and of harmonic colour, his 'programme' writing was not devoid of some ingenuousness that seemed unintentional. While apparently aiming at some psychological treatment, he penetrated no deeper than pictorial suggestiveness. The work abounds, however, in telling musical effects of the symphonic order. It was the absence of effects of this class that lessened the impression made by the Rhapsody 'The culprit fay,' of which descriptive music was the chief material. The composer proved an alert and efficient conductor both in presenting his own works and in directing the accompaniment to Liszt's E flat Piano-forte concerto, which was played by Mr. John Powell. The instrumentalists were the London Symphony Orchestra.

On June 29, Dr. Ethel Smyth gave a repetition of the concert of her works with which she scored a striking musical and propagandist success on April 1. The London Symphony Orchestra and the Crystal Palace Choir again took part. The vocalists on this occasion were Madame Blanche Marchesi, Mrs. Elsie Swinton, and Mr. Frederic Austin.

The Jubilee of the Institute of Naval Architects was musically celebrated with a choral and orchestral concert given at Queen's Hall on July 5. The choir was that of the Leeds Festival, the orchestra consisted of past and present members of the Royal College of Music, and Sir Charles Stanford conducted. His picturesque and individual 'Songs of the Fleet' were sung with Mr. Plunket Greene as soloist, and under such circumstances secured the great popularity they deserve. The other choral numbers, in which the characteristic brilliance of the choir was fully displayed, were Bach's 'Sing ye to the Lord' and Parry's 'Blest pair of Sirens,' Mackenzie's 'Britannia' and Elgar's 'Cockaigne' overtures were the purely orchestral numbers, and the soloists were Madame Agnes Nicholls and Mr. Percy Grainger. The concert was a notable event, and served to lend a momentary spark of life to the moribund season.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The London (formerly the 'New') String Quartet, themselves a gratifying example of British executive talent of the first rank, recently provided an attractive example of native composition at Bechstein Hall. This was a new String quartet by Mr. J. D. Davis, who has employed in it all his resources as a writer of sane, melodious, well-knit and logical music.

On June 28, at Æolian Hall, the London Trio brought to an imposing conclusion their task of performing all Beethoven's works for violin, violoncello and piano-forte. Their performance of the Trio in B flat, Op. 97, was one of great dignity and executive perfection.

VOCAL RECITALS.

Songs by Augusta Holmès formed part of an interesting programme given by Miss Irene St. Clair at Æolian Hall on June 19. At the same hall on June 20, Mr. Eric Oulton (tenor) and Mr. Jack Emerson (bass) gave an afternoon recital and Mr. Campbell McInnes an evening recital. The chief feature of the latter was the introduction of some new songs by Mr. George Butterworth.

Two further recitals were given by Madame Yvette Guilbert at Bechstein Hall on June 26 and July 3. The former was a repetition of her clever impersonations of 'fifteen types of woman.' At the latter she gave a varied programme, with the assistance of members of the International School of Opera as chorus.

Miss Irene Ansley, a contralto from New Zealand, was heard at Bechstein Hall on June 27, when she displayed a voice of fine power and emotional quality. At the same concert Miss Constance Lyall (soprano) sang and Dr. Deszo Szanto played piano-forte solos.

The Welsh tenor, Mr. Daniel Beddoe, gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on June 27, and showed that the esteem in which he is held by the American public is well deserved. At the same hall, on the following day, Miss Janet Spencer, an American-born singer, revealed versatile artistic powers and an attractive mezzo-soprano voice.

Recitals by the Hon. Mrs. Julian Clifford are rare, and that given by her in conjunction with Miss Myrtle Meggy (pianist) at Æolian Hall, on June 29, was a welcome reminder of her gifts and ability. The programme included two new songs, 'S'il est un charmant gazon' and 'Attente,' by Juliette Folville. The singing of Mlle. Speranza Calò at Bechstein Hall, on June 29, was admirable in its vocal and expressive qualities. Mr. Bertram Binyon sang at Æolian Hall on June 30, and gave some notable interpretations of old Italian songs.

A selection of Mr. George H. Shapiro's vocal compositions was set forth at Bechstein Hall on June 30, with Lady Sybil Smith, Madame Parks-Brownrigg, Miss Phyllis Lett and Mr. Leonard Ashdowne as exponents. They displayed a decided gift for song-writing.

A 'historical scena,' consisting of Delavigne's 'La mort de Jeanne d'Arc,' spoken to music composed by M. Bemberg, was given by Signor Roberto Biletta at his recital of 'Chansons dites' at the Ritz Hotel on June 3.

Herr Reinhold von Warlich's high ability as a lieder singer was exercised in a programme of examples by Schumann, Loewe and Wolf at Bechstein Hall on July 4.

At a 'private matinée' given on July 10 at Æolian Hall, Madame Jeanne Granier carried out in an attractive manner a short but varied programme of light operatic extracts, songs, and recitations. A joint recital was given with merited success by Madame Louise Balthy and Mr. Henri Léoni at Bechstein Hall on July 11. At her 'historical recital,' given on the following day at the same hall, Mrs. Lathrop sang several early French and Italian examples.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

The most interesting events to record under this head are the two recitals given by Herr Max Pauer at Bechstein Hall on June 19 and June 26. Some time had elapsed since his last appearance, and the public had probably forgotten that he was in the front rank of executants, a position which he fully established on these occasions by his brilliant performances of Reger's 'Variations and fugue on a theme by Bach,' Op. 81, and Rachmaninoff's 'Variations on the C minor Prelude of Chopin.'

Mr. Robert Lortat, who gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on June 19, exhibited a versatile command of style. Mr. Vernon Warner showed at Æolian Hall on June 28 that his development from the prodigy stage is making satisfactory if not over-rapid progress. In the course of her recital at Steinway Hall on June 29, Miss Carolyn Willard played skilfully, Schumann's 'Faschingsschwank aus Wien.'

The pupils of Mr. Carl Weber displayed the advantage of his teaching at Bechstein Hall on July 4. On July 5, M. Cernikoff gave a recital at Æolian Hall, and gave rather vigorous treatment to Schumann's 'Carnaval.' Miss Augusta Cottlow gave an admirable performance of Macdowell's 'Norse' Sonata at Steinway Hall on July 7.

Neatness characterised the piano-forte playing of Mrs. Halkett at Steinway Hall on July 15. Schytte's Sonata in B flat, a Purcell Sonata for violin (Mr. Frank Greenfield) and piano-forte were the chief numbers.

On July 19 a piano-forte recital was given at Bechstein Hall by pupils of the Tobias Matthay School. Miss Evangeline Livers and Miss Lily Kennard were among the clever juveniles. The Misses Holder, Elsie Bennett, Kennedy Fraser, Sophie Vance, Mr. Jacobs and Mr. Levinson, deserve special mention.

OTHER RECITALS.

The maturing powers of the Cherniavsky Trio, consisting of Leo (violinist), Jan (pianist) and Mischel (violinist) were shown at Æolian Hall on June 19. The young players have justly attracted much attention.

Miss Senta Laubach (vocalist), Mr. Cecil Laubach (violinist), Mr. Armin Laubach (violinist) and Mr. Alfred Laubach (pianist) gave a successful concert at Steinway Hall on June 29.

Mischa Elman repeated his familiar reading of Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole' at Queen's Hall on June 24, and was heard also in Mozart's Sonata in B flat. Mr. Percy Kahn was his accompanist. M. Kubelik gave a recital before a large audience at the same hall on July 1, assisted by Mr. Alexander Raab (pianist). They were heard together in Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 30, No. 2).

Among the several unusual features of the concert given by Mlle. van der Meersch at Portman Rooms on July 4, the most interesting was the clever zither-playing of Miss Cissy Boehm. Miss Bessie Griffiths appeared as both vocalist and violinist at Steinway Hall on July 5.

Herr Havemann gave his second recital at Queen's Hall on July 8, and strengthened the opinion, which is widespread in Germany and gaining ground in England, that he is among the first rank of violinists.

A number of Signorina Eugenia Calosso's compositions, consisting chiefly of songs, were brought before the public at Portman Rooms on July 10. They revealed a command of fluent melodic writing.

Another example of skill in zither playing was that given by Madame Kitty Berger on July 12 at 45, Egerton Gardens.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

It was gratifying to notice the very large part which music played in the Coronation Celebrations, and especially to observe the great advance made both in the recognition given to the art and in the standard of music selected, and in the performance given thereof. Without exception, in every Anglican church a portion of the music used at Westminster was rendered, and in many cases the whole of the service music was adopted. Special mention must be made of the elaborate and beautiful services thus obtained in the churches of St. Andrew (Mr. H. Moreton), St. Catharine (Mr. Manley Martin), and St. Peter (Mr. John Hele) in Plymouth; of St. George (Mr. G. A. Birch) in Stonehouse; of St. John the Baptist (Mr. A. T. Townsend), and St. Michael (Mr. W. N. Curnow) in Devonport. In St. George's Church, Stonehouse, on June 28, Mr. G. A. Birch gave a Coronation organ recital, including Cowen's March, the choral prelude 'Ein feste Burg,' and the 'St. Ann's' Prelude and Fugue (Bach).

The Three Towns Church Union celebrated two Festivals on July 6 and 13, at Devonport and Plymouth respectively, attaining under the able conductor, Mr. Manley Martin, an artistic and devotional standard and degree of accuracy rarely reached before in the history of the Union. The ten choirs affiliated—St. Andrew's, St. Catharine's, Charles Church, Christ Church, St. Gabriel's, St. Matthias, Stoke Damarel, St. Bartholomew, St. John's, St. Michael's, St. Paul's—produced a total of 362 voices. The evening canticles were sung to Attwood in C, and the anthem was Horsley's 'I was glad,' which was beautifully sung. The Coronation psalms were sung to new chants by Messrs. H. Moreton and Manley Martin, and instead of the usual singing of the Te Deum, the 'Hallelujah Chorus' and National Anthem were given with great spirit at the close of the service. At the Devonport Festival the organist was Mr. A. T. Townsend, and at Plymouth Mr. H. Moreton was at the organ.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

At Torquay, on June 21 and three following days, was produced a Devonshire rural play, 'Revel Day' introducing many 'Songs of the West,' from the collection of Rev. S. Baring Gould. The orchestration and incidental music were the work of Mr. William Back, conductor; and from a musical point of view the play proved interesting and significant.

Choral festivals under the auspices of the Exeter Diocesan Choral Association have been conducted by the honorary conductor, Mr. T. Roylands Smith, in various deaneries. The Cathedral events, on June 15, drew a choir of 750 singers from the deaneries of North Devon. The morning canticles were sung to settings by J. M. W. Young in G, and the anthem was 'O praise the Lord' (Goss). Dr. D. J. Wood was at the organ.

Other festivals have been held at Plymstock (July 5) with 202 singers; Woodleigh (July 6) with 172 singers; Beer (July 11) with 223 singers; Kelly (July 12); and Tavistock (July 20). Where the service was evensong the canticles were sung to Vincent in G, and the alternative anthem 'O how amiable are Thy dwellings' (Eaton Fanning) was used.

CORNWALL.

Inadvertently we omitted to report last month the 'opening' of a new organ in Luxulyan Parish Church, on June 1, by Dr. Monk, of Truro Cathedral. Camborne Centenary Wesleyan Choir held a festival on June 18, rendering Gaul's 'Ruth,' under the conductorship of Mr. J. H. Tellam. The Truro diocesan choral festival on June 27, was participated in by 506 singers, under the arrangement of the Precentor, Rev. Canon Corfe. Dr. Monk conducted, assisted by Messrs. English (St. Austell), Hawkins (Fowey), A. W. Gill (Kenwyn), Hall (assistant organist of the Cathedral) and Monk (son of the conductor). The evening canticles were sung to a setting by Parry, and the anthem was 'The Lord hath been mindful of us,' from Wesley's 'Ascribe unto the Lord.'

EDINBURGH.

A children's Coronation Song festival, under the patronage of their Majesties The King and Queen, was given in the McEwan Hall on June 24. The choir—numbering some 400 voices, drawn from various schools in the city and supplemented by tenors and basses from a number of local choral societies—was assisted by Mr. T. H. Collinson at the organ and a string orchestra led by Mr. Winram. The conductor was Mr. R. McLeod, and under his able guidance the choir gave highly meritorious performances of Elgar's 'Coronation Ode' and a number of national and patriotic songs. The soloists—Miss Clara Dow, Miss Marion Christie, Mr. W. H. Oldham, and Mr. George Campbell—were thoroughly capable, and had each to respond to recalls.

Under the auspices of the Edinburgh Provincial Committee for the Training of Teachers, and conducted by Mr. J. A. Moonie, a recital, chiefly of choral music, was given in the McEwan Hall on June 28. The choral numbers, which were finely sung and interpreted with that high degree of musical intelligence always associated with performances given under Mr. Moonie's direction, comprised a Coronation Ode composed by Mr. Moonie to words by Mr. William Guy; Arthur Somervell's 'Elegy'—in which the contralto solo was admirably sung by Miss Elizabeth M. Morrison, a present student of the College—the same composer's 'The Charge of the Light Brigade'; and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' (tenor soloist, Mr. W. H. Oldham). Mr. Thomas Clow, a present student of the College, also sang, and Miss Agnes Copeland (accompanied by Miss Marguerite Bruel) contributed violin solos. An excellent small orchestra, led by Mr. Henry Dambmann, Mr. T. H. Collinson at the organ, and Mr. Martin Hobkirk and Mr. W. B. Moonie at the two pianofortes, provided the accompaniments.

LIVERPOOL.

The arrangements for the forthcoming eleventh Festival of the Liverpool Church Choir Association have been completed. A programme of seven choral items has been drawn up, and includes anthem, 'The Lord is great in Zion' (W. T. Best); 95th Psalm (Mendelssohn); 'Hymn to the Trinity,' unaccompanied (Tchaikovsky); Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in E flat, and anthem, 'My God, I love Thee' (G. J. Bennett); anthem, 'For all the saints' (C. T. Reynolds), and Handel's 'Zadok the Priest.'

The anthem by Dr. Reynolds was chosen by the adjudicator, Dr. G. J. Bennett, out of nineteen compositions sent in anonymously by local composers. On the invitation of the committee, Dr. Bennett has consented to attend the Festival and conduct his two works included in the programme.

In place of the usual winter season of chamber concerts given by the Schiever Quartet, which have lapsed owing to Mr. Schiever's retirement and departure from Liverpool, it is reassuring to note that the Brodsky Quartet will be heard here; and, in addition, thanks to the enterprise of Mr. Laurence Atkinson, visits from the St. Petersburg Quartet, the English String Quartet, and the Rosé Quartet (Vienna) have been arranged. An exceptionally interesting outlook as regards chamber-music is completed by the establishment of the Rodewald Concert Club, which is intended to provide a series of musical evenings on Bohemian lines, but under unusual conditions of sociability and comfort.

The silver jubilee of Mr. William Faulkes, organist of St. Margaret's Church, Anfield, and widely-known as a prolific organ-composer, was recently marked by a public gathering and presentation at which the vicar, the Rev. Prebendary Wakeford, presided, supported by Dr. A. L. Peace, Mr. F. H. Burstall, and other representative local musicians. The chairman spoke in eulogistic terms of Mr. Faulkes's musical gifts and personal character; and the well-known vicar of St. Margaret's also said that when preaching in America his chief claim to distinction appeared to be that he came from the church in Liverpool where Mr. Faulkes was organist.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

The public examinations in connection with the Royal Manchester College of Music have provided the only music here during the past month; on July 4 and 6 the two concerts showed conclusively that it is in concerted chamber music that the College is gaining most renown: not a surprising development perhaps, seeing that Dr. Brodsky, Messrs. Carl Fuchs, Max Mayer, and Spelman are all professors there.

A Mozart trio for pianoforte, viola, and clarinet, played by Messrs. John Wells, Edwin Dunn (clarinet), and Miss Liliás Dunlop, was especially enjoyable, and in Miss Juanita Aitken there is promise of exceptional ability if her singing of Weber's 'Ocean' aria is a fair criterion. Only in the important branch of composition does progress appear slow. As last year, Miss Alice Dill alone appears in the programmes as a composer, four of her fellow-students playing two movements from a MS. String quartet. Miss Kontorovitch (who is to play at Hallé's next winter) gave an uncommonly brilliant performance of the first movement of the Elgar Violin concerto.

In the Cathedral, on July 1, the second festival of the Diocesan Church Music Society was held. No fewer than 1,200 singers took part, drawn from Blackburn, Bury, Burnley, Oldham, and Rochdale. Goss's anthem 'Praise the Lord,' a couple of Handelian Coronation anthems, and a Bach motet were sung, and Dean Weldon preached an appropriate sermon. Prior to this gathering in Manchester, district festivals had been held during the week ending July 1 in the five towns above-named. Evidence that this diocesan festival idea has achieved popularity is afforded by the fact that, although only eighteen months old, the membership numbers about 5,000, drawn from 150 choirs. Last year there was observed a tendency to regard these services (which are designed as an act of worship and for the promotion of feelings of brotherhood amongst those engaged in this work) too much in the light of sacred concerts. No fewer than eighteen such festivals have been held throughout the Manchester diocese in the past year. Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson, the organist of the cathedral, has every reason for satisfaction at the results of his labours in the cause.

On July 23 the Manchester Orpheus Choir made its first public appearance after its German tour, at a concert for a deservng Sunday School Mission.

The annual summer meeting of the Manchester College of Music Club (now in its fourth year), on July 20, acquired unusual significance from the presence of Mr. Egon Petri, who this month leaves us for Berlin. This sort of private farewell doubtless brought together the unusually large attendance of old students, and a thoroughly interesting evening's music resulted. Mr. John Lawson and Mr. Charles Kelly were the instrumentalists, and Mrs. J. Fletcher Shaw (Miss Nora Meredith), along with Mr. Neville, sang Schumann and Reger lieder. Mr. Neville has long been known privately as perhaps the ablest local singer of Wolf and Reger lieder, and the more public recognition recently accorded his powers, although somewhat belated, is matter for congratulation.

At this annual summer gathering it is customary to bring forward some new chamber composition. Last year Mr. Edward Isaacs's pianoforte and violin Sonata was introduced; this time it was a Sonata for the same instruments by Mr. Sydney Rosenbloom, of Edinburgh, who has worked under Mr. Frederick Corder. It revealed quite natural and spontaneous gifts in the composer, displaying considerable originality in the slow movement. It was played by Mr. Anton Maaskoff and Mr. Egon Petri, the latter displaying his exceptional powers in Busoni's arrangement of the great C major Toccata of Bach, and Chopin's B minor Sonata. Thus was a most fruitful ministry at the College brought to a close. Future days will probably show that Petri shared with the late W. H. Dayas those notable formative influences which leave indelible impressions upon all who are fortunate enough to have been associated with them.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.—A Coronation concert given at Claremont, on June 26, by the Suburban Choral Society, was a success in every way. The principal choral works performed were Sullivan's 'Festival Te Deum' and 'Domine saluum fac,' in which the choral singing displayed the advantages of the good training received from the conductor, Mr. Arthur McConnell. There was also a miscellaneous selection, in which 'Zadok the Priest' was not forgotten. The concert came to an end with Sir J. M. Meiring Beck's Volkslied 'South Africa, dear land.' Instrumental support was given by the band of the Hampshire Regiment, under the direction of Mr. Orbrinski. The solo vocalists were Madame Emilié White and M. Commaile.

DURBAN.—A concert performance of Mascagni's 'Cavalleria Rusticana' was given on May 27, by the Durban Philharmonic Society, under the direction of Mr. Sydney Payne. The effectiveness of the singing and of the orchestral playing secured a great popular success, in spite of the difficulties attaching to this method of presenting a stage opera. The solo parts were well taken by Miss Ethel Moon (Santuzza), Miss Agnes Carnegie (Lucia), Miss Rachel Guthrie (Lola), Mr. Rushworth (Alfio), and Mr. Harold Payne (Turiddu). The miscellaneous part of the programme included six numbers from Tchaikovsky's 'Casse-Noisette' suite.

JOHANNESBURG.—The Amateur Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. F. W. Peters, gave a highly successful Coronation Concert on June 14, at the Caledonian Hall. The chief orchestral numbers—Wagner's 'Rienzi' Overture, 'Huldigungsmarsch' and 'Rule, Britannia' Overture, a Symphonic Suite on Verdi's 'Aida,' and German's Coronation March from 'Henry VIII.'—were played with great spirit and effect, and were enthusiastically received. The vocal soloists of the concert were Miss Maggie Duncan, Miss Emily Kroll, Mr. George Hooten, and Mr. Alfred Bertwhistle, who were heard together, with orchestral accompaniment, in the Prologue from Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George.' The pianist was Mr. R. B. Lloyd, the organist Mr. A. Gray Murray, and the leader of the orchestra, Mr. Charles Davies.

KIMBERLEY.—The Kimberley Musical Association, founded in 1901 by Mr. J. Frank Proudman, and now brought under municipal control as the Diamond Fields Musical Society, gave a concert at the Town Hall on June 13. A long selection from 'Judas Maccabeus,' and some miscellaneous items were sung with great popular success under the direction of Mr. A. H. Ashworth. An orchestra, led by Herr Carl Rybuike, together with Mr. J. A. A. Ellis at the organ and Mr. B. E. Farrer at the pianoforte, supplied the accompaniments for the evening. The solo vocalists were Mrs. A. O. Heslop, Madame Watkins Allen, Mr. Aldrovand Maynard and Mr. J. L. Wintle.

WELLINGTON (N.Z.).—Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' was sung with great success by the Musical Union on May 17, under the direction of Dr. Bradshaw, and created a deep impression. The choral work showed the advantages of sound training and enthusiasm. The solo singers were Mrs. Burns, Mrs. Firth, Mr. Stephens, Mr. Sidney Williamson, and Mr. Johnston.

Foreign Notes.

BADEN-BADEN.

Under the direction of Herr Heinrich Laber, the very rarely heard one-act opera 'Turandot,' by Adolf Jensen, has recently been performed with considerable success.

BASEL.

Two festival concerts devoted to works by Liszt were given on June 10 and 12, under the conductorship of Professor Hermann Suter. The programmes included the oratorio 'Christus,' Psalm 137, and parts of the 'Graner Festmesse.'

BAYREUTH.

Dr. Hans Richter is credited with the intention of settling permanently in Bayreuth, and founding there an operatic school, on the termination of this year's festival performances, which he will again conduct.

BERLIN.

On June 16, the usual season of summer opera at the Neues Königliche Operntheater commenced with a performance of Wagner's 'Meistersinger.'—On the retirement of Professor Dr. Max Bruch, Herr Engelbert Humperdinck has been appointed principal of the 'Meisterschule' for composition at the Königliche Akademie der Künste.

COLOGNE.

The annual festival performances given in the opera house under the auspices of the Kölner Festspielverein took place during the latter part of June. The scheme included Wagner's 'Tristan und Isolde' and 'Die Meistersinger,' Richard Strauss's 'Der Rosenkavalier' (conducted by the composer), and Bizet's 'Carmen,' given by the ensemble of the Théâtre Royale de la Monnaie of Brussels, under the direction of M. Sylvain Dupuis. The festival terminated with a performance of Johann Strauss's 'Die Fledermaus,' with a cast of artists from Vienna.

COBLENZ.

The Musikverein has received a donation of £5,000 from Kommerzienrat Wegeler, a prominent citizen of Coblenz. Half of the interest on this sum is to be given as a subsidy towards the production of new orchestral and choral works.

FLORENCE.

A new opera, 'Giovine Italia,' by the young composer Mario Pierraini, has been produced with success at the Verdi Theatre.

GÖRLITZ.

The seventeenth Silesian Musical Festival took place on June 18-20, and was a great success. The programmes of the three concerts given were as follows:—I. The Hallelujah Chorus from 'The Messiah' and an Organ concerto by Handel, a Cantata by Bach, and the second act of Gluck's opera 'Orfeo ed Euridice.' II. A Symphony by Haydn, Concerto for two pianofortes and orchestra by Mozart, and Beethoven's 'Missa solennis,' a remarkably fine performance of which was secured. III. Weber's Overture to 'Euryanthe,' Schubert's Symphony in C major, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, Schumann's 'Spanisches Liederspiel,' Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' and the final scene from Wagner's 'Meistersinger.' The presence of Dr. Karl Muck from the Royal opera in Berlin as conductor, ensured the success of the festival. He had at his disposal the Berlin Königliche Kapelle and a number of well-known soloists. The choir of 676 voices acquitted itself admirably.

MUNICH.

Dr. Richard Strauss has been presented with an address signed by Prince Ludwig Ferdinand of Bavaria and a number of other distinguished people, in which he is urged to undertake the duties of conductor at the coming Mozart Festival in succession to the late Herr Felix Mottl. He at first asked to be excused on the ground that his new work, the 'Alpen Symphonie,' would be occupying all his attention for a considerable time to come, but he has now consented to conduct some of the performances.

PARIS.

At the Opéra two complete cycles of Wagner's 'Ring der Nibelungen' have been given during the latter part of June and the beginning of July. The first cycle was conducted by Herr Felix von Weingartner, and the second by Professor Arthur Nikisch, who made such a success that he was engaged to direct a special performance of the 'Götterdämmerung' (Le Crépuscule des Dieux) on July 12.—At the Théâtre Lyrique de la Gaité, the great Russian bass singer M. Chaliapin has appeared in a series of six special performances, at which Massenet's 'Don Quichotte,' Verdi's 'Don Carlos' and Rossini's 'Il Barbiere di Siviglia' were each given twice.

A public meeting was recently called in Greenock to consider the formation of a musical society to foster the love and practice of choral music locally. Mr. Kyrie Orr, the chairman, said that it was not intended to form a choral union. It was felt, however, that there was great need for systematic training in choral music, and that if the proposed society was formed one of its first acts would be to approach the School Board with a view to establishing throughout the town classes where young men and women would be thoroughly taught. There would thus be an increase in the material from which choirmasters would draw their choirs. A second object to be aimed at was the provision of a common meeting ground for musicians in the town. It might also be found possible to hold musical competitions such as were so successful in Wales. Another method by which a love of music might be fostered in the town was by the provision of band performances, for which there were quite a number of suitable positions in town. The motion that a society be formed was carried, and a provisional council, with Mr. J. M. Leighton as secretary, was appointed.

On the occasion of the Centenary of William Makepeace Thackeray, celebrated at a garden party held at the Middle Temple Hall on July 18, there was a concert given by Mr. William Forington and chorists and ex-chorists of the Temple Church, under the direction of Dr. H. Walford Davies. The programme included a Prologue consisting of a choral setting of the passage beginning 'Let us now praise famous men and our fathers that begat us,' from the Book of Ecclesiasticians. Other choral items were an arrangement of the traditional 'Little Billee,' which was sung by three of the chorists, eight of Dr. Davies's delightful nursery rhymes, the trio 'Evening,' by Henry Smart, and the part-song 'Sweet day so cool' [it was one of the heat record days of the summer], by Sir Hubert Parry. When 'Here's a health unto his Majesty' was sung all the audience stood. Mr. Forington sang the following songs written to Thackeray's words: 'At the church gate' (R. Walthew), 'The mahogany tree' (Herbert Sharpe), and 'Wapping Old Stairs' (Percy).

The fifty-fourth annual Festival of the Tonic Sol-fa Association was held at the Crystal Palace on June 24. A choir of 5,000 persons sang with excellent tone and spirit under Mr. Filmer Rook and Mr. Alfred Sears. Mr. C. H. Rowcliffe accompanied on the organ. The senior choir of 1,800 voices was conducted by Dr. J. E. Borland. The chief item was Stanford's 'Phauidrig Crohoore,' which exacting piece was sung most creditably. There was a full orchestra. Mr. E. Stanley Roper was the organist.

Mr. Warren T. Clemens, of Aberdeen, has been appointed Director of the music in all the schools under the Peterhead Board. He will not teach, but will observe and supervise the ordinary school teachers' work. This appointment will not involve the abandonment of Mr. Clemens's Aberdeen engagements. He will now have practically the whole of the school music education in Peterhead under his direction, as for some time past he has taught the student-teachers in training at the Peterhead Academy, and besides he conducts the local choral society. No doubt Mr. Clemens owes his new post to the great reputation he has gained as a choir trainer by his successes at the Aberdeen Competitive Festival. The performances of his choirs on these occasions were on the level heard at the best events in England.

In the Athenaeum we read that 'an incomplete manuscript of Wagner's "Die Hochzeit" is said to have been discovered in a second-hand shop at Berlin, and to have been purchased by an English collector for £1,750. It was at Leipzig, in 1832, that Wagner began to compose an opera of this name. He sketched, also scored, an Introduction, chorus, and septet for the first scene. Both sketch and score were probably left behind at Dresden when Wagner hastily quitted that city in 1849. In 1879 he heard of the score being offered for sale by a Würzburg collector, who asked 250*l.* for it. Ellis, or rather Glasenapp, tells us in his "Life of Richard Wagner" that Wagner began a lawsuit to recover his manuscript. His claim was, however, dismissed, and he had to pay costs amounting to 600 marks. Does the manuscript just discovered contain the sketch or scores, or both?'

A retrospect of the season of Sunday afternoon concerts at the Royal Albert Hall has been issued, giving a list of the artists who have appeared. The vocalists consisted of fifteen sopranos, two mezzo-sopranos, one contralto (Madame Kirkby Lunn), two tenors, and five baritones and basses. The instrumentalists were eleven pianists, eight violinists, three violoncellists and seven organists. There were thirty-one concerts given. The New Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Landon Ronald, played on every occasion except on March 19, when their place was taken by H.M. Grenadier Guards and Irish Guards.

At a meeting of the Court of the Musicians' Company it was, upon the proposition of Sir Frederick Bridge, unanimously resolved to bestow upon the Lord Mayor the honorary freedom of the Company 'in recognition of the services rendered by him to music at the recent International Musical Congress.' The Company has also decided to confer the freedom on Sir Edward Elgar. The presentations will be made on October 24.

On July 13, at the invitation of Colonel T. C. F. Somervill, the members of the Musicians' Company attended a garden party at Kneller Hall. An orchestra consisting of no fewer than 200 players performed with great effect an attractive programme under the direction of Captain S. Welton. Mr. Alfred H. Littleton (Master of the Musicians' Company) expressed the thanks of the guests for the very enjoyable entertainment afforded. The programme included:—March, 'Vivat Rex Georgius,' student C. E. Richardson; Overture, 'Macbeth,' Sullivan; selection from the works of Brahms, arranged by Captain A. J. Stretton, M.V.O.; 'Benedictus,' Mackenzie; March, 'Spirit of Pageantry,' Percy Fletcher; selection, Elgar; Overture, 'Academic Festival,' Brahms; 'Rosamunde,' music, Schubert; 'Entry of the Gods into Valhalla,' Wagner; 'Three English Dances,' Roger Quilter.

The Sheffield World-tour Choir had a great welcome at Brisbane early in June. The audiences at the concerts were large and enthusiastic, and the singing of the Choir under Dr. Coward's direction was much admired. On July 16 the Choir arrived in Melbourne, and was received by the Lord Mayor in the Town Hall. Dr. Harriss spoke with great appreciation of the warmth of the greeting they had experienced in Australia.

The prize of £2,000 offered by the directors of the New York Metropolitan Opera House for an opera by an American librettist and an American composer has been awarded to Mr. Brian Hooker and Dr. Horatio Parker for their opera 'Mona.'

The valuable musical library of the late Ebenezer H. Prout, who was the professor of music in Dublin University, is now installed in the principal room of the Library of Trinity College, Dublin, and is accessible to students.

Answers to Correspondents.

G. S. CHADWICK.—Mr. J. F. Bumpus's books on London City Churches, Cathedrals, Churches of North Germany, &c., are published at six shillings net. They are all excellently written and produced, and are well illustrated, but organs are not specially shown. Regarding our issue for October, 1908, it is out of print, but the publishers will do their best to procure one if you will apply to them. The safe course for all readers is to subscribe for the Musical Times.

ALWYN WRIGHT.—Never stop your practice of scales; work at them for at least ten minutes a day, and of course work also at special studies. Muscular exercises away from the pianoforte do not much influence technique, but may keep the muscles supple. As to an instruction book, you had better consult a teacher who can study your case.

COSMO.—Mrs. Rosa Newmarch's books detailed in the sketch of her life given in our April issue will give you an all-round view of Russian music, and particularly of Tchaikovsky. We do not know of any one work that treats of the folk-songs of all nations, but Grove's 'Dictionary' will probably serve your purpose.

F. GODSELL.—As we have repeatedly stated, there are tens of thousands of violins in existence labelled Antonius Stradivarius. Labels are very cheap. It is impossible to estimate the value of your instrument merely on this data. You can purchase nice new violins so labelled for half-a-sovereign, or less.

MARTIN 'KLICKMANN.—We are sorry your letter was overlooked. 'King Bulbous' (P. H. Crib and H. Festing Jones) might suit you. Although it is issued in Novello's school operetta series, it is really better adapted for adults than children. The libretto is very wittily written.

W. W. WALLINGTON.—There is no law except that of good taste to prevent the band you name describing itself as the best brass band in the world. It is all a matter of opinion, and this is their opinion of themselves.

COMPETITOR.—Do you not read the Competition Festival Record? That gives periodically a list of competitive festivals.

W. A. B.—All the musicians you name are dealt with in Grove's 'Dictionary of Music.'

A MASTERS.—You had better apply to the secretary of the Royal Albert Hall.

In the answer to 'EUREKA' given in our July issue it was erroneously stated that the copyright of the whole of Wagner's 'Ring' had expired. 'Götterdämmerung' is still copyright.

A HANDBOOK

EXAMINATIONS IN MUSIC

CONTAINING

600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY

ERNEST A. DICKS,

Fellow of the Royal College of Organists.

PREFACE TO THE SEVENTH EDITION.

Through the kindness of Dr. E. H. Turpin the seventh edition of the Handbook of Examinations in Music includes the latest type of Papers set by Trinity College of Music, London, in their scheme of Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge.

The work will also be found to have been considerably enlarged by the addition of fifty specimen questions, with answers. They have been designed for the most part after the manner of those set in the Theory Paper for the L.R.A.M. Diploma, and also that required by candidates for the Higher Practical Examinations held by Trinity College of Music, London. The author earnestly hopes that these additions will considerably enhance the value of the Handbook, and render it increasingly helpful to students.

NEW HARVEST ANTHEMS

BY CALEB SIMPER.

- *GREAT IS THE LORD. Just published .. .. . 4th 1000 3d.
Opens with a broad, majestic and powerful chorus. This is followed by a sweet Soprano Solo (or Sop. Full) which leads to some spirited and initiative movements for the different voices, with beautiful modulations.
- *THE LORD THY GOD HATH BLESSED THEE. New 14th 1000 4d.
Contains a rolling Bass Solo, a Sop. or Tenor Solo, with bold and interesting choruses, also a soft chorus which would be extremely effective as a quartet.
- *SEEDTIME AND HARVEST. New .. .. . 12th 1000 3d.
An attractive Anthem, easy, melodious, and full of inspiration.
- *THOU VISITEST THE EARTH .. .. . 13th 1000 4d.

A SUCCESSFUL NEW WORK FOR CHURCH CHOIRS AND CHORAL SOCIETIES.

THE
HARVEST COVENANT
A SACRED CANTATA.

FOR SOLO VOICES (S.C.T.B.), CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

The Words chiefly selected from the Revised Version of the Scriptures.

THE MUSIC BY
A. L. COWLEY.

CONTENTS.

- No. 1.—THE CREATOR'S GIFTS.
No. 2.—THE EVERLASTING COVENANT.
No. 3.—THE PROMISE OF PLENTY.
No. 4.—THE HARVEST PSALM (Psalm LXXV.).
No. 5.—THE COVENANT KEEPER.

Each number is complete in itself and suitable for separate performance. For Harvest Festivals and other special occasions the length of service can readily be arranged as required.

Twenty-two Choirs of Enfield, Enfield Highway, Winchmore Hill and District united in a performance of this work. "A splendid performance,—in every way a success.—Of the work itself we cannot speak too well,—the Cantata will rank among the high-standard musical works."—The Enfield Observer, September 30, 1910.

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Has made its way wherever heard. . . . Full of the melodious, tuneful spirit which breathes in all Mr. Gaul's work, and will add yet another leaf to the wreath which has crowned the efforts of the masterly composer of the 'Holy City' and other works."—Putney Borough News.

"Mr. Gaul's music is, as usual with him, replete with spontaneous melody."—Manchester Examiner.

"Mr. Gaul's choral writing is always fluent and pleasing, and this is fast becoming something to be thankful for."—Leeds Mercury.

"To the list of works which have proved widely acceptable, 'Una' should be added."—Athenaeum.

"Choral societies have long shown that Mr. Gaul is a composer whom they are glad to accept. 'Una' will find its way amongst them easily."

THE TEN VIRGINS

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Will be heartily welcomed by all who love the art of music."

—Newcastle Journal.

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard, and will assuredly be placed among the foremost compositions of this kind by present-day writers . . . treated in a thoroughly artistic manner. . . . a perfect wealth of melody and striking individuality of style."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"Works which have placed him in the front rank of English composers—the 'Holy City,' 'Joan of Arc,' and 'The Ten Virgins.'"—Newcastle Daily Journal.

"The choral writing in 'The Ten Virgins' is alone something to be thankful for, and, as we have intimated, it is only one of the many musical virtues of the Cantata."—Leamington Chronicle.

"BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE CHOIR.—The hall was overcrowded by an audience that was disposed to encore every other number of the work. That Mr. Gaul should have secured this undoubted popular success with a work far more contrapuntal than any of his former works is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole."

—The Musical Times.

"The subject is an excellent one for a Cantata . . . a stronger work than 'Joan of Arc.' Melodious, vocal, and of moderate difficulty, and, like Mr. Gaul's earlier Cantatas, will be eagerly welcomed by societies in search of new works having these characteristics."—Newcastle Daily Leader.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favoured 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever. Mr. Gaul has aimed at fine outline and telling colouring, and all that he has aimed at he has achieved."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; cloth, gilt, 4s.
Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal Parts, each, 1s.; Words only, 5s. per 100.

JOAN OF ARC

AN HISTORICAL CANTATA

FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Few Cantatas are as rich in chaste melodies, charming choruses, and exquisite orchestration as Alfred R. Gaul's 'Joan of Arc,' performed for the first time in Plymouth by the Vocal Association in the Guildhall."

—The Western News.

"Must enhance the high reputation of its composer."—Liverpool Courier.

"The inspiration of a highly-refined musician. . . . The Cantata is even a more masterly and beautiful work than 'The Holy City'."

—Huddersfield Examiner.

"No more charming Cantata than 'Joan of Arc' could have been chosen. It abounds in delicious music. There is not a tedious note in it."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Chronicle.

"Gives the listener a vivid and realistic impression, its attractiveness being continuous instead of spasmodic."—Bradford Observer.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description."—The Shields Daily News.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.;
Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal parts, each, 1s.; Words only, 7s. 6d. per 100.
(Ent. Stationers' Hall.)

The gratuitous loan of instrumental parts of Mr. Gaul's works may be had on application to the Composer, Gillott Lodge, Edgbaston, and full liberty is given to perform these Cantatas and to insert the words in any programme without further permission.

ADDITIONAL HYMNS WITH TUNES

HYMNS ANCIENT AND MODERN
OR ANY OTHER CHURCH HYMNAL.

Hymns only, medium 32mo, diamond type, cloth, 4d. ; paper, 3d.

For this reason the Hymns are numbered from 801, so that the numbers may not interfere with the use of any other hymn book, no other Church hymn book having as many as even seven hundred hymns. Each hymn has its own distinctive tune, and no hymn or tune in this work is found in Hymns Ancient and Modern (Old Edition), so that with the two books no duplication occurs.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or, briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

The

Competition Festival Record

No. 37.

PERTH.—May 18, 20.

This Festival was under the auspices of the Perthshire Church Choir Union. The Union was fired by the example of Aberdeen. The adjudicator was Mr. J. A. Moonie (Edinburgh). The North U.F. Church (Perth), under Mr. Edward Nicol, gained the challenge cup, and St. Leonard's U.F. Church (Perth), under Mr. T. Burgh, gained the first place in another class. In the school choir section, the Northern District School (Perth) was first. Mr. Fairweather, of Kinnoull P.S., gained a prize for the best original tune. The solo-singing winners were: Soprano, Miss Vera Brough; contralto, Miss Annie Fyfe; tenor, Mr. James Guild; bass, Mr. J. Auld.

The general superintendent was Mr. Edward Nicol, Paradise Place, Perth.

LYTHAM (LANCASHIRE).

June 14, 15, 16, 17.

This Festival was held with its customary success. It attracts competitors from a wide area. A certain intimate friendly bond between the promoters and the competitors seems to have become a tradition. The competitors know that their convenience and comfort will be studied so far as the limited accommodation will permit, and that they will receive courteous welcome. As we have pointed out on previous occasions, this pretty seaside resort labours under the great disadvantage of not having a commodious public hall. The Festival performance has to be held in the Pier pavilion, which is not nearly large enough for the purpose. One unfortunate result of this inadequate accommodation is that even when all the available seats are sold it is not possible to recover the cost of the Festival. The promoters are therefore compelled to look for subscriptions from sympathisers. The fact that this year such assistance was not so readily forthcoming as it should be, led to some rumours of the possibility of the Festival being abandoned, at least temporarily. But we are glad to be able to announce that the mere suggestion of such a misfortune has so stirred local patriotism that the committee, of which Mr. John B. Crook is the moving force and of which Mr. Allon Wilson is the devoted secretary, has been encouraged to determine to hold a four days' festival as usual next year on June 12 to 15, and they have already engaged Dr. McNaught and Mr. Harry Evans, who, with Mr. C. H. Fogg, of Manchester, officiated at this year's Festival.

The first day's proceedings dealt chiefly with local competitors. A girls' solo section, in which the test was C. E. Horn's dainty song 'I've been roaming,' brought forward over 20 singers, Eva Winchester (Newton) coming out first. Miss Nellie M. Thomson, of Waterloo (Liverpool), gained a prize by a very charming performance of Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo Capriccio, and local contraltos sang Dr. Blow's 'Self-banished,' Miss Marguerite Samson (Freckleton) gaining the first place. Mr. John Armit (Blackpool) gained the baritone prize.

Two very attractive unison school songs were sung in the local school choir class. They were 'The crystal coach' (Forrester) and 'The three dragons' (Brown). These were quite beautifully sung by Wrea Green (Mr. T. H. Myles) and Singleton (Mr. Thomas Dawson), and other schools did very well. Wrea Green was placed first. In the church choir (men and boys' section) the singing was not very satisfactory. The Parish Church (Lytham) Choir, under Mr. S. H. Broughton, was first. Action songs were a strong feature at the proceedings of the evening session. St. John's (Lytham) and Ansdell C.S. each sent two parties. One of the Lytham parties gave an amusing and very clever performance of 'Dolls for sale,' and were awarded first prize.

On the second day adult open solo singing was the chief occupation. There were 71 entries, some competitors coming from a great distance. The tests, &c., were as follows:

SOPRANO (15).

Tests: 'Spring' (Henschel).
'Die Mainacht' (Brahms).

- 1st. Miss A. Blacoe (Blackpool).
2nd. Miss Ruby Rainford (Lytham).

CONTRALTO (27).

Tests: 'Sappho's farewell' (Gounod).
'Sapphic ode' (Brahms).

- 1st. Miss Elsie Maughan (Manchester).
2nd. Miss Ethel Kershaw (Nelson).

TENOR (11).

Tests: 'Preislied' (Wagner).
'The River' (Elgar).

- 1st. Mr. Norman Dramsfield (Halifax).
2nd. Mr. J. W. Lingard (Hebden Bridge).

BARITONE (18).

Tests: 'Song of Pan' (Bach).
'Ich Grille Nicht' (Schumann).

- 1st. Mr. J. Cooper (Morecambe).
2nd. Mr. N. Hodgson (Halifax).

A good deal of the singing in all the above classes was of a high standard.

On the third evening small church and chapel choirs sang 'The Lord is my strength' (Booth), and 'Love, farewell' (Brahms). Five choirs sang, and generally showed good training. The Rawcliffe Street Wesleyan South Shore Choir (Mr. J. T. Schofield) displayed fine tone, first-rate choral technique and excellent expression, and were awarded first prize.

The final day (Saturday) was reserved for the open choral classes for female-voice, male-voice and mixed-voice choirs. Many of the best small organizations in the North-West district appeared. They were conducted by trainers of great reputation. In all there were about 800 competitors. The tests were of the finest and most searching kind. The following is a brief summary of the proceedings:

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

Tests: 'Summer wind' (E. MacDowell).
'Sound sleep' (Vaughan Williams).

(Maximum marks, 80 each piece.)

		Marks.
	South Shore Ladies' (Mr. J. T. Schofield). Revue, Blackpool (Mr. J. R. Rigby).
3rd.	Adelaide Street, Blackpool (Mr. J. S. Warburton)...	141
2nd.	Barrow St. James' (Mrs. Bourne). Hope Vocal Union (Mr. Jas. Hardy).	143
1st.	Blackpool Glee and Madrigal Society (Mr. Herbt. Whittaker)...	146
	Blackpool Orpheus (Mr. Clifford Higgin). Lytham Vocal Society (Mr. S. H. Broughton).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

(Not more than 36 voices.)

- Tests: 'The night march' (Schumann).
 'Far beyond all mortal ken' (Schubert).
 'Music all powerful' (Walmisley).

The only two entries in this class were:

Manchester Mendelssohn Choir (Mr. A. W. Lomas).
 Burnley Co-operative Vocal Union (Mr. E. Wallwork).

The Habergham choir had entered, but were unable to attend. The Burnley choir gained the first place.

(Not more than 20 voices.)

- Tests: 'Marching along' (Granville Bantock).
 'The soldier's death' (Brahms).

In this section there were no fewer than eleven entries. The first place was gained by the Middleton Musical Society (Mr. John Kirkman), and the second by St. Helen's Excelsior (Mr. Abram Jones); a third prize was awarded to the 'C.W.S.' choir (Mr. Lewis Evans).

Great interest was taken in the mixed-voice choir class, because choirs were conducted by Mrs. Bourne, Mr. Herbert Whittaker, Mr. Tattersall, and others known to fame. The tests were:

- 'On Himalay' (Granville Bantock).
 'The vale of rest' } (Mendelssohn).
 'Departure'
 'Morning song of praise' (Max Bruch).

The first and last pieces were the crucial tests. 'On Himalay' is one of the finest of Bantock's part-songs, and it presents considerable technical difficulties beyond its demand of a subtle interpretation. 'The morning song' is a gorgeous piece. It is scarcely adapted for small choirs, because its climaxes call for such big sonority. Nevertheless some imposing performances were given. The entries were as follows:

Preston Vocal Union (Mr. William Tattersall).
 South Shore Vocal Union (Mr. J. T. Schofield).
 Blackpool Orpheus Glee Society (Mr. Clifford Higgin).
 Blackpool Glee and Madrigal Society (Mr. Herbert Whittaker).
 Salford Vocal Society (Mr. Fred. W. Blacow).
 Barrow Madrigal Society (Mrs. Bourne).

Barrow maintained its reputation of being one of the very finest small choirs in the country, and amidst much enthusiasm was awarded the Challenge Shield. Mr. Whittaker's choir was a close second to Blackpool Orpheus, with the South Shore Vocal Union following in that order.

Before the adjudication was given by Dr. McNaught, the combined choirs sang 'The morning song,' under the skilful direction of Mr. Harry Evans. As all the performers knew the piece thoroughly, they were a plastic material for Mr. Evans to shape. The effect was magnificent and thrilling. With this superb climax the Festival came to a glorious and memorable close.

CLEETHORPES MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—June 16, 17.

The competitions displayed a very fair level of excellence, especially when it is borne in mind that this was only the third Festival held at Cleethorpes. There is no doubt that the competitive movement is producing good results in the neighbourhood.

There were classes for pianoforte, violin, junior and senior solo singing, junior and adult choirs, duets and quartets. In all there were twenty-three sections. Nine elementary schools sent choirs, with the result that the Welholme Girls, Grimsby, were first, and the Edward Street Boys, Grimsby, second. The test was the two-part song, 'Cleansing fires' (Cowen). In a three-part song class for schools there were eight entries, the first place being gained by South Parade Senior Girls, Grimsby. The Burton Street Boys, under the direction of Mr. Tom Patterson, gave a performance of the cantata, 'The walrus and the carpenter' (Percy Fletcher) at the evening concert.

On the adult day five local choirs competed in one section. The Cleethorpes Choral Society (Mr. David Jessop) was first. The test-pieces were German's 'Who is Sylvia' and Brahms's 'Love, fare thee well.' In another mixed-voice choir section there were five entries, the Garibaldi Choral Society (Mr. Percy Wilson) coming out first. The tests were 'Angelus' (Elgar) and 'When love and beauty' (Sullivan).

A special feature was the singing of the massed choirs conducted by Mr. Dan Price, the adjudicator at the evening concerts. The tone produced approached in quality that of some of the best Yorkshire choirs.

GLASGOW.—June 19, 21, 23, 24.

This was the first competitive musical festival organized on a large scale in Glasgow. It was held in connection with the Exhibition opened this year. Good management, an attractive programme and the contiguity of many excellent choirs combined to make the gathering eminently successful. Glasgow and Edinburgh choirs have always had a good reputation, and a keen contest was therefore assured. The entries were extraordinarily good. So numerous were they that arrangements had to be made to hold preliminary competitions in several classes.

Some of the choral performances reached a very high standard. This was particularly evident in the mixed-voice choir challenge shield and challenge cup classes. The former class was thrown open to choirs from anywhere, but the latter class was confined to Scotch choirs.

It was clear that many of the conductors knew how to train scientifically, and to interpret. Sometimes there was an endeavour shown to extract expression by ignoring the rhythmic factor as an element of the composer's conception, and there was a tendency to exaggerate dynamical contrasts. Some beautiful performances were given by the Glasgow Glee and Madrigal Society and the Ayr Burgh and County choir. In the male-voice choir class (open) the English choirs dominated clearly. The Cleveland Harmonic Choir was in particularly good form in this class. The audiences were always good and sometimes very large. They included many who were ready not only to criticise the choirs but to adjudicate the adjudicator—a quite harmless vent.

Dr. McNaught was the adjudicator on the two principal days, viz., June 23, 24. Dr. Somervell and others heard the choral preliminaries and the Scottish songs. Marks were awarded under the following heads: (a) Correctness, 10; (b) tone, blend, and intonation, 20; (c) attack, pronunciation, and enunciation, 10; (d) expression and general interpretation, 20; and general effect, 20. Total, 80.

An interesting feature of the Festival was a competition in the singing of Scottish songs, for which prizes of gold medals were awarded. There were a large number of competitors. The following were the songs selected, and the results of the competition:

- Soprano: 'Doon the burn, Davie, love.' Miss Mary Auld (Newmills).
 Contralto: 'Logie o' Buchan.' Miss Mary T. Dawson (Dundee).
 Tenor: 'O, open the door.' Mr. Andrew T. Hastie (Edinburgh).
 Bass: 'Turn ye to me.' Mr. Hugh McDonald (Glasgow).

The honorary secretary (Mr. F. H. Bisset ('Askomil,' Bishopton, Renfrewshire) must have worked very hard and shown rare patience and judgment in organizing so great a business with so much success.

MANCHESTER.—June 24.

The District Nonconformist Choir Union held its annual competition at the White City. Six choirs entered in the open mixed choir class, the Manchester Clarion Vocal Union (Mr. Thos. Corlett) coming out first, and Edgeley Wesleyan S. S. Choir (Mr. T. L. Ford) second. Four nonconformist choirs competed in another class, and Altrincham (Mr. J. A. Hill) was first. Sixty-five soloists competed. The winners were as follows: Soprano, Miss Gwladys Hodgson (Chorlton-on-Medlock); contralto, Miss Gladys Harwood (Chorlton-on-Medlock); tenor, Mr. H. W. Jones (Moss-side); bass, Mr. Alfred E. Hooper (Timperley).
Mr. Harry Evans adjudicated.

HULL.—July 5, 6.

This centre made a fresh and successful start after an abandonment for a year or so. It was on this occasion under the auspices of the Hull and East Riding School of Music, of which the principal is Dr. G. H. Smith. The entries were very numerous in the solo classes (vocal and instrumental), and the choral classes were also well supported.

The adjudicators were Dr. E. C. Bairstow and Mr. Julian Clifford. The chief results were as follows:

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

- Tests: 'The cloud' (C. H. Lloyd).
'The three fishers' (Wolstenholme).
1st. Beverley Ladies' Choir.
2nd. Brigg Ladies' Choir.

MADRIGAL COMPETITION.

- Test: 'While the bright sun' (Byrd).
1st. Dr. Smith's Select Choir, Hull.

CHAPEL CHOIRS.

- 1st. Goole United Methodist.

DOUGLAS, ISLE OF MAN.—July 8.

This was a competition organized as part of a Coronation and Jubilee Carnival. It was successful in attracting many excellent solo singers and five good choirs from England, but only one from the Isle of Man. The season being in full swing the time and energies of the Manx folk were occupied in catering for the thousands of visitors who visit Douglas and its beautiful surroundings. The audience was never large in relation to the huge, beautiful hall; the weather being fine and hot, people not unnaturally preferred to stay outdoors. The tests, results, &c., were as follows:—Soprano: 'O love, that rulest' (E. German), Miss May Clague (Douglas). Contralto: 'Softly awake my heart' (Saint-Saëns), 1. Miss Antoinette Greenwood (Blackpool); 2. Miss Annie Armistead (Lancaster), a young singer with an exceptionally beautiful voice. Tenor: 'Eleanore' (Coleridge-Taylor), Mr. John W. Berry (Colne). Bass: 'Droop not, young love' (Handel), Mr. Allan Irvine (Colne). There were two mixed-voice choir classes, but there was only one appearance in each. Mr. J. S. Warburton brought his excellent Blackpool choir to sing 'Spring enchantment,' a characteristic and rather difficult part-song by Bantock, and the madrigal, 'Sister, awake,' by Bateson. Mr. Moore brought his Manx choir to sing 'Sweet honey-sucking bees' (Willbye) and Bantock's 'Spirit of night,' another of this composer's most modern and daring unaccompanied choruses in eight parts. Both choirs sang with great effect.

In the male-voice choir section the following choirs appeared:

- Colne Orpheus Glee Union (Mr. L. Greenwood).
Barnoldswick Glee Union (Mr. F. Lord).
Habergham Glee Union (Mr. E. Hitchon).
Todmorden Male-Voice Choir (Mr. Lawson Berry).

The tests were: 'Feasting I watch' (Elgar) and 'Lucifer in starlight.' The first two choirs named sang very well, but were not able to cope with the exceptionally great difficulties of 'Lucifer.' The piece has many remarkable and original choral effects, but it makes great tonal demands on choralsists. The grim words are by George Meredith. In the Elgar part-song Habergham was in splendid form, but in 'Lucifer' they displayed some uncertainty and lack of finish. Todmorden sang 'Feasting I watch' with fine tone, but the middle movement was taken too slowly. In 'Lucifer' they showed sufficient familiarity with the piece to sing it with much dramatic effect and fluency. The result was that Dr. McNaught, the adjudicator, awarded them the first prize and the second to Habergham.

On the Sunday evening the Todmorden choir assisted at a concert given in the Palace Hall. Mr. Wood's excellent orchestra played, and Miss Lenora Sparkes sang with her usual brilliancy. Mr. Jamieson Dodds also sang to the great satisfaction of the audience.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.—July 8.

This competition was held in connection with the demonstration of 'The Protestant Alliance.' Mr. Maskell Hardy adjudicated. Queen's Park Congregational Choir, Harrow Road, and Church Hill Wesleyan Choir, Walthamstow, tied for first place.

PORTSMOUTH.—July 12.

This event was held in connection with the annual Band of Hope demonstration. The adjudicator was Mr. Maskell Hardy. In the three-part unaccompanied competition—test-pieces: 'O happy fair' and 'Now is the month of Maying'—a splendid performance was given by the Crystal Palace Prize Choir from Lake Road (Mr. W. T. Sayer). Eight choirs entered for the two-part competition—test-pieces: 'The flowrets are nodding,' F. Gartz (unaccompanied), and 'Maybells' (accompanied). The results were: First prize, Stamford Street; second prize, Southsea Central; equal third, Buckland Congregational and Lake Road.

BLACKPOOL.—October 10, 11, 12, 13, 14.

The syllabus of this great competition can be obtained (post-free, 4d.) from the honorary secretary, Mr. Lionel H. Francey, Town Hall, Blackpool. It is an interesting document if only because of its enumeration of the tests for fifty-seven classes.

THE ROYAL NATIONAL EISTEDDFOD OF WALES, CARMARTHEN.

August 7, 8, 9, 10, 11.

In the chief choral competition for choirs of from 150 to 200 voices, open to all comers, the tests are: 'Be not afraid' (Bach), 'O, death, thou art the tranquil night' (Cornelius), and 'How sweet the moonlight sleeps' (D. Emlyn Evans). It is announced that the Bach motet is to be accompanied by the Eisteddfod orchestra, but no accompaniment exists. In the male-voice choir section, Hegar's 'Walpurga' and David Jenkins's 'Peace, be still' are the tests. In the 'second choral' class for choirs of from 60 to 80 voices the tests are: 'How lovely is Thy dwelling-place' (Brahms) and 'Oh tranquil night' (E. T. Davies).

General secretary, Mr. J. C. H. Portnell; Hon. secretaries of Musical Committee, Mr. J. R. Lewis and Mr. W. Dunn Williams. Address to Eisteddfod office, Carmarthen.

The mid-Somerset competitions were held this year at Frome, on May 9, 10, 11. There were numerous entries. Among the first-prize winners were Bathwick Church Girls' School, and the same boys' school, Lullington Church School, Clutton Choral Society, Astwick, Midsomer Norton, and the Frome Male-Voice Choir. Dr. Walford Davies and Mr. Clive Bayley adjudicated. Morris dances were a feature. These were judged by Mr. Cecil Sharp, and he placed Miss Rooke's team first. The combined choirs gave an excellent performance of Handel's 'Samson.' Miss Hilda Foster was one of the soloists.

The Association of N.W. Norfolk Village Choirs held their Festival at Hunstanton on May 6 and 8. The children's sections sang only as a combined choir. In the adult choirs section Holkham, Ringstead, Thornham, and Hunstanton Village were prize winners. Dr. A. H. Mann adjudicated.

MUSIC AND MIRACLES.

The MACDONALD SMITH System of Pianoforte Playing is described by some pupils as "miraculous." Others say:—

"I can play pieces hitherto undreamt of"; "My fingers feel as though a kind fairy had touched them"; "I can play old pieces at sight better than when practising them daily"; "I feel as if I had been given a new pair of hands"; "Worth twenty times the fee charged"; I have passed my examination with honours," &c., &c.

M. MACDONALD SMITH, 19, BLOOMSBURY SQUARE, LONDON, W.C.

DO YOU NEED TO PRACTISE YOUR MUSIC
BEFORE YOU CAN PLAY IT SATISFACTORILY?

Most players need to practise a new piece over and over before they can give a satisfactory rendering, and probably this is the case with you.

If you were a good sight-player your fingers would fall instinctively and automatically on the right notes, and you would obtain immeasurably greater pleasure from your playing.

Years of daily practice MAY make you a good sight-player, but my System cannot fail to do so.

I guarantee that a pianist of average ability will become able to play any piece within his or her technical ability after three months of about 15 minutes' daily practising. The testimony of hundreds of students will amply corroborate this claim.

Booklet sent free to any pianist.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

From the opening Allegretto scherzando—a particularly fresh and blithesome section—to the concluding Gavotte and Musette, the music runs a simple, melodious course. . . . The work is conceived throughout in a joyous mood, but the composer, by his deft use of rhythms, never allows the hearer to experience any sense of sameness.

STANDARD.

On many occasions Mr. Percy Pitt has proved his versatile musical gifts, but rarely have they been indicated in a more attractive way and with such a pleasant vein of fancy as in his "Serenade." . . . These five sketches are like little water-colours in their lightness of design and delicacy of hue, and appeal to the imagination because of their unpretentious, simple, yet interesting character.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

The "Serenade" scored one of the most brilliant successes of the season. It has everything in its favour—melody, piquant orchestration, and clever musicianship.

DAILY MAIL.

It is a work which should be immensely popular.

DAILY NEWS.

The Suite as a whole made very pleasant hearing, and should prove popular with conductors of small orchestras.

SUNDAY TIMES.

Its melodiousness, clearness, and deft orchestration make it delightful hearing.

THE BAND OF THE ROYAL MARINES (PORTSMOUTH DIVISION), AND LIEUT. GEORGE MILLER.

The motto of the Royal Marines, 'Per mare per terram,' neatly sums up the amphibious duties of this well-equipped force of about 20,000 men, whose existence is not so well realised by the community as it should be. The marines are trained to handle the guns of a man-of-war and for action on land. Their achievements in co-operation with the ubiquitous British Navy and the Army have called forth many encomiums, and have earned for the force a great reputation at headquarters. As they are neither 'Tommies' nor 'Jacks,' they are familiarly known as 'Joeyes.'

It was Lord St. Vincent who said: 'There never was an appeal made to them for honour, courage, or loyalty that they did not more than realise my highest expectations. If ever the hour of real danger should come to England, the Marines will be found the country's sheet-anchor.' Tommy's opinion of the Marines is voiced in the vernacular by Rudyard Kipling in his 'Soldier and Sailor too,' written after the story of splendid behaviour of the force on the occasion of the sinking of the 'Victoria' in 1893. These are some of the lines:

For there isn't a job on the top of the earth the beggar don't know nor do!

You can leave 'im at night on a bald man's ead to paddle 'is own canoe,

'E's a sort of bloomin' Cosmopolot

Soldier and Sailor too.

Another verse finishes:

Ho! they aint no limpin Procrastitudes

Soldier and Sailor too.

There are three divisions of the Marines, having their land training head-quarters severally at Chatham, Plymouth, and Portsmouth. In addition a corps of Royal Marine Artillery is stationed at Portsmouth, and a Royal Marine Depot at Deal. It is with the Band belonging to the Portsmouth division, and its widely known and esteemed bandmaster, Lieutenant George Miller, M.V.O., Mus. Bac., L.R.A.M., that we propose to deal in this article.

The history of the Band is obscure. Until recent times Service bands were supported by the officers, and therefore there are no old official records in existence. At the beginning of the last century it is recorded that the Portsmouth Marines Band played every morning on the Governor's Green in Portsmouth during the trooping of the colour and changing of the Guard. The Band then consisted of two flutes, two oboes, eight clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, two serpents, one bass horn, four trombones and three 'time beaters,' who were black men, the regimental drummers assisting when necessary.

In the reign of George IV. the Band accompanied His Majesty in a voyage round the British Isles. But it was during the time of Queen Victoria and the Prince Consort that at the Osborne Palace the Band was most in attendance on royalty. When Lieut. Miller took the Band over, its most cherished tradition was its intimate connection with Queen Victoria and the Royal Family. The Band played at the wedding of Prince Henry of Battenberg in 1885, and it also had the sad duty of playing at his funeral in 1896, for which occasion Lieut. Miller composed a funeral march.*

Although the chief part of Lieut. Miller's public career is identified with the band he directs, it is interesting to trace in his early life the streams of circumstance which led to his occupation of the position he so ably fills. He was born in London, on November 26, 1853. His father was a member of the Grenadier Guards Band, and afterwards became bandmaster of the 63rd Regiment. Thus young Miller was in his early childhood made familiar with the sight and sound of the various instruments of the military band, and was, so to speak, to the manner born. He recalls that his first appearance as a British bandsman was at an Eisteddfod at Carnarvon, where his father was conducting the Holyhead brass band. Young George was then nine years of age, and he blew a horn. Since then he has frequently adjudicated at Eisteddfodau, and has always taken a special interest in those events. Miller, senior, was a pupil of Koenig, and it is noteworthy that he was the only teacher of the cornet that Levy, the famous performer, ever had. The deflecting influence of a chance episode in life in determining a future was never better illustrated than in the circumstances under which Miller senior and Levy became acquainted. When Miller was in the Guards band there were no stands provided for the players. When the band played in public at St. James's Palace the willing services of boys to hold the music were utilised. A little Jewish boy of lowly origin always fought for and obtained the privilege of holding for Miller, and the intelligent interest of the lad led Miller to arrange to teach him the cornet, and, as history records, the boy became a world-wide celebrity.

When it was ordained that bandsmen must enlist, Miller resigned his bandmastership and sought a living by playing in theatre and other bands. In this way he was at Glasgow for a time. Whilst there Miller, junior, still a mere lad, secured some pianoforte lessons and practice—there was no instrument at home—in return for services in a music shop, and meanwhile he occasionally officiated as drummer in the theatre. The visit of an opera company, conducted by Sir Michael Costa, led to a well-remembered incident in the lad's life. The big drummer had fallen ill, and in the emergency young Miller was recommended for the business, in the execution of which he might easily mar if he could not make the music. It was with due pride that the neophyte contrived to satisfy the great and fearsome martinet. Later, he played under Arditi, and again satisfactorily, and the mantle of fame having thus fallen upon him, Alfred Mapleson, the librarian, who was also a viola player in the opera orchestra, engaged him as his assistant in connection with his music library at Leicester Square, London. In this peculiar sphere of musical activity, which involved attendance at the Opera, he came again into contact with Costa, and he made acquaintance with many other well-known musicians of the day whose constant needs the library supplied.

Hankerings derived from his early experiences soon prompted him to seek a career in a military band. In order to qualify himself he found it necessary to enlist, and was advised by Colonel Whitmore, then commandant at Kneller Hall, to join the 16th Regiment, which he did, with the ambition to become its bandmaster. After a period of drill he entered Kneller Hall for a complete course of musical study. During this period of studentship he assiduously worked at the regular curricula of studies, and besides found time to teach singing in the school, play the organ at a local church, and train the choir at yet another. He was in this arduous way gaining an all-round experience that advantageously influenced his future. In 1875 he was granted the full Kneller Hall certificate for competence in all matters relating to military bands, and on leaving he became the bandmaster of the regiment (the 16th) in which he had enlisted. Another certificate of still greater importance was granted to him in this eventful year. He was married to Miss Emily Kent, a well-known vocalist at Chatham. In 1876 the regiment and its band went to India, and Miller of course accompanied it. After four years' experience of the climate, the indisposition of his wife forced him to return to England. It was not long before his services as bandmaster were secured by the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, a post that involved playing the organ at the church. It was the organ duty that brought Miller to know Sullivan, an acquaintance fraught with consequences. Sullivan's father had once held the post then filled by Miller. One day Miller was startled by hearing some one play his organ, and on going to the seat (Allegro) probably prepared to say things, found it was Sullivan, who, on an unannounced recreative visit, was renewing old associations. On the following Sunday, Sullivan was induced to take the service, but on condition that the curtains were to be drawn round the seat and nothing was to be said. Miller held the position until 1884, and during this period obtained the Bandmaster Licentiate'ship of the Royal Academy of Music.

It was in this year that he became a candidate for the vacant post of Bandmaster of the Royal Marines (Portsmouth Division). Sullivan gave him a strong recommendation, and he influenced the Duke of Edinburgh to add his support. At this time it was the fashion in all well-regulated regiments to have a German bandmaster and a French cook. The candidates were reduced to six, and of these Miller was the only Englishman. But as his acquirements and experience were unique, and his backing being so influential, he was appointed to the post which he has held until to-day, notwithstanding strong temptations to other spheres of musical activity. The fact is, the work and its environment are congenial to him, and by his ability and force of character he has moulded and polished the band until it has become an expression, a mirror of himself.

The Portsmouth Band is not a training-school for ship bands. It exists for duty in connection with head-quarters, and is, therefore, a permanent institution. As it is required for a variety of functions and is allowed to accept engagements, it has a double constitution. The Service regulations require each player to be an efficient performer of a military band instrument, but at Portsmouth at least he is free to take up the study of a second instrument.

The Royal Marines Band (Portsmouth Division).

(From a Photograph by C. Corn, Metrohol Studios Cardiff.)

As most of the members avail themselves of this advantage, the Band is 'military' or 'orchestral' as called for. When we visited their practice-room for the purpose of this article they played the last movement of Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony, with the military band formation, and then the whole Symphony with the orchestral formation, and it was hard to say that one performance was more effective than the other, they were both so excellent. Lieut. Miller has no faith in transcriptions, by which is meant the distribution of ordinary orchestral parts amongst the players and casual adaptation of the instruments to the music. That makes for distortion, so all the military band pieces are carefully arranged in accordance with the genius of the instruments and in view of the balance. He deplors the fact that so few composers write for the military band, but he recognises that there is not a large market to tempt composers and publishers. Lieut. Miller is very painstaking in endeavouring to secure fine phrase treatment. In order to help to induce a vocal kind of sostenuto, or singing style, he forms the men into a choir, and they seem as ready to sing tunefully and expressively in four parts as to play. The repertoire of the Band is a large one, including many classic and quite modern works. The 'Valse triste' of Sibelius is one of the most recent additions.

The following is a synopsis of the contents of the library and the particulars of the constitution of Valse	... 'Tres Jolies'	Waldteufel.

Suite d'Orchestre	'L'Arlésienne'	Bizet.

Formed by a selection and amplification of some of the interludes composed for Alphonse Daudet's play of that name. There are two such suites, that now presented being the first.

The numbers chosen are (1) March, (2) Minuet, (3) Adagietto, (4) Carillon. The use of a melodia estinata in the last number is very quaint and interesting.

The Suite is arranged for use of this band by kind permission of Messrs. Choudens, of Paris.

Tone-Poem	... 'Finlandia'	... Sibelius.
-----------	-----------------	---------------

Particular interest is attached to this work, for its composer is regarded as the founder of the Finnish school of music, and his two tone-poems, 'Eine Saga' and 'Finlandia,' are his most characteristic works.

The music of Sibelius derives its distinction chiefly from its reflection of national folk-songs, in common with Grieg the Norwegian, and with Edward German the Englishman; in all three cases the imitations being so truly characteristic as to be frequently mistaken for the very songs and dances of old time which they so ably represent.

In 'Finlandia' we find allusion to the historic greatness of the Finns, then to national vicissitudes. We are then rallied, as it were, from contemplation of a somewhat gloomy past to the living joys of the present; and the second part of the composition is animated and gay, full of rapid movement, exhilarating as a sleigh ride on a bright frosty day, with a charming melody of folk-song character introduced by way of contrast.

Selection	... 'Aida'	... Verdi.
	Euphonium—Musician Thorpe.

Cornet Solo	'There is a green hill'	Gounou.
	Soloist—Musician Allen.

Einzug der Götter in Walhall
aus dem Musik-Drama 'Das Rheingold'		Wagner.

Fantasia on Students' Songs	...	Douglas.
-----------------------------	-----	----------

Introducing 'Dulce Domum' and many other songs and duties dear to the heart of the public school man. In treating 'Who killed Cock Robin,' the composer, whilst evidently agreeing as to the traditional culprit, disagrees as to the weapon employed, proposing a cord (a Lost Chord) rather than an arrow. This and other witty sallies are crowned in the Finale, wherein 'A health unto His Majesty' and 'The dashing White Sergeant' are treated à la Tchaikovsky.

Bassoon—Musician Hickford.
Oboe—Musician Norman.

Lieut. Miller was given the Jubilee medal in 1887 and the additional bar for 1897. In 1892 he gained the Bachelor of Music degree at Cambridge. His exercise was on the Spanish Armada, but although it passed the examiners it suffered the melancholy fate of its namesake and that of innumerable other degree exercises in disappearing from view. He received his commission as lieutenant in 1898, and is, therefore, the senior bandmaster of the British Army. The late King Carlos made him a Chevalier of the Portuguese order 'La conception,' on the occasion of a visit of the Band to Lisbon, and he was awarded the M.V.O. by King Edward for his services at the funeral of Queen Victoria.

For many years before himself becoming an officer, he was an honorary member of the officers' mess. This was a rare social distinction, highly esteemed, and marked the rising status of that branch of the profession so well represented by Lieut. Miller.

Lieut. Miller has had four daughters and three sons, all of whom are alive. The eldest son, another George, bids fair to achieve the popularity of his father. At the age of twenty-one he became bandmaster of the Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry regiment, and is now bandmaster of the 1st Life Guards. He is married to the lady well-known in the musical world as Miss Gleeson-White, a professional soprano vocalist of the first rank. His second son, after serving in the South African war with distinction, has remained in the country, and his third son follows the musical profession. All his daughters are happily married.

At the meeting of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, held at Folkestone in January, 1910, Lieut. Miller read a paper entitled 'A military band in being.' The paper excited much attention at the time, alike for its substantial information and its racy style. Many who heard it, and many more who did not, will be glad to know that this paper has been greatly expanded into a book, which will shortly be issued in Novello's 'Primer Series,' under the title of 'A Military Band Primer.'

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

(Concluded from August number, p. 507.)

When, in the Autumn of 1875, Macfarren entered upon his administrative duties as principal of the Academy, he had to face an external situation of much complexity. Mr. Mapleson, a well-known opera entrepreneur of the day, had recently resolved to erect a great opera house on the Thames Embankment, and he designed to attach to the edifice a new home for the Academy. The prospect was alluring, but it was fortunate that the Academy committee was sufficiently cautious to decide to 'wait and see' before they committed themselves, for after the foundations of the theatre had been laid the whole project had to be abandoned on financial grounds.

A far more delicate and fateful problem of policy awaited solution. A movement to establish a new National Training School of Music, fostered by the Society of Arts and actively supported by important social forces, including members of the Royal family, had after years of discussion and missionary effort reached a stage of realization. Adequate funds to supply numerous scholarships had been obtained, and a Mr. (afterwards Sir) Charles Freake had generously undertaken to provide the School with a commodious building at South Kensington. Was the new School to absorb the Academy, should it be grafted on to the Academy, or should each institution pursue an independent course, in undesirable opposition to each other? These were the distracting questions. The promoters of the School were careful to explain publicly that they had no desire to oppose the Academy, but rather to unite with it. But no proposition that savoured of anything less than a forfeiture of the chartered rights and privileges of the Academy was ever laid on the table. The Academy shorn lamb was to lie down with the School lion, but with the lamb inside. Whether on both sides more tact and a more intelligent anticipation of events before they occur might have resulted in the establishment at this period of one great Conservatoire that would have carried everything before it, is a speculation that belongs to the dead category of the might-have-beens. As it was, the School, with its advantage of social patronage, its numerous free scholarships, and its specially-constructed premises, and the Academy with its pinched means and legitimate pride of achievement, each elected to work out its salvation independently. Perhaps, after all, the inevitable rivalry was a healthy fillip to all concerned. The developments of time certainly support this view, for at present we all know that the Academy is prosperous beyond all anticipation, and that the School which in 1882 became the Royal College of Music is also one of the most successful musical institutions in the world.

During the period that the scheme for the Royal College of Music was incubating there was still talk of amalgamation with the Academy. But on the occasion when the College was formally inaugurated by the then Prince of Wales, on May 7, 1883, it was stated by Mr. (afterwards Sir) George Grove that the hope so long entertained that the Academy would join the College 'had unfortunately been dissipated.' The statement elicited a letter written by Mr. Walter Macfarren on behalf of the Academy committee, in which he said that the dissipation of the hope had not resulted from unwillingness of the Academy directors to meet the views of his Royal Highness, and further that it had already been pointed out that the Charter of the Academy was elastic, and that the committee had offered to modify the working of the Academy in order to meet the views of the promoters of the College; but nothing came of the discussion.

From this period until the death of Macfarren there were no new developments of importance. The Academy was able to attract many of the most eminent professors of the day, and consequently the number of students steadily increased. In 1880 Mr. William Shakespeare (who in 1871 had gained the Mendelssohn scholarship, the most valuable prize of its kind in the Kingdom) was appointed conductor of the students' concerts, and in 1886 he was succeeded by Mr. (afterwards Sir) Joseph Barnby, who held the post until 1888, when it was assumed by the new Principal.

MR. FREDERICK CORDER.

Sir George Alexander Macfarren died on October 31, 1887, and after a brief interregnum Dr. (now Sir) Alexander Mackenzie was in 1888 elected Principal. Mackenzie had already been associated with the Academy, he having won a King's scholarship there by violin playing in December, 1862, and he remained a student until 1865. Since that date he had returned to his native city of Edinburgh, and later he sojourned in Florence for some years in order to study and compose. He came back to England in 1885, and soon afterwards settled in London temporarily. Meantime he had made a great reputation as a composer. His election to the Principalship of the Academy was welcomed alike by the profession and the public. A full sketch of Sir Alexander's career was given in the Musical Times for June, 1898.

The new administration speedily brought about several wise changes of policy. For many years prior to the period of Sir Alexander's régime, the Academy had very successfully held local examinations in music throughout the Kingdom; and a most important step was taken when the Chairman of the Academy committee, the late Mr. Thomas Threlfall, opened negotiations between the Academy and College with a view to the formation of a joint board for the conduct of those examinations. The scheme, after due discussion and some opposition, was happily adopted, and under the name of the Associated Board it has succeeded even beyond the hopes of its far-sighted and broad-minded promoters, and it is now exercising a powerful influence upon musical education, and the general progress of the Art both at home and in the Colonies. The Board, under the Chairmanship of Sir William E. Bigge, is not merely a strong one for its musical purposes, but makes a moral appeal because it displays to the public the unity of aim and a friendly co-operation of two institutions that were supposed to be in some degree rivals. The agreement between the two schools to establish the Board was signed in 1889, one year after Sir Alexander's appointment. In this achievement, so far as the Academy was concerned, much credit was due to Mr. Threlfall, to whose wise and enlightened views the Academy generally owes much of its prosperity.

In 1890, the Duke of Edinburgh resumed the position of President of the Academy from which he had retired for a time. He occupied the office until his death in 1900. In May, 1901, the Duke of Connaught accepted the presidency, and he retains the post at the present time. Another instance of royal interest in the Academy was the visit of King Edward and Queen Alexandra (then the Prince and Princess of Wales) to St. James's Hall in July, 1897, to distribute the prizes to the Academy students.

An appointment that has been a fruitful source of strength and usefulness to the Academy was that of Mr. Frederick Corder, a former student, to the position of Curator in 1891. It was not, however, the duties of Mr. Corder as Curator—and they are numerous—that drew round him so many of the most gifted students. It is his force as a musical thinker, his ability as a teacher of orchestration and the highest forms of composition, his vast acquaintance with modern music, as well as with the ultra-modern, that constitutes his magnetism. His influence is exemplified in the work of his pupils, Granville Bantock, W. H. Bell, J. Holbrooke, Benjamin Dale, Von Ahn Carse, York Bowen, Eric Coates, J. B. McEwen, Paul Corder (his talented son), and many others who have distinguished themselves in composition.

Mr. Corder has literary gifts of a high order, and one of their characteristics is a caustic wit. His yearnings for verbal expression of his opinions on musical things in general found some vent in The Overture, a monthly musical journal for Academy students, established in March, 1890. This venture, unfortunately, did not enjoy a long life. It died, we believe, in 1894. One of the many startling and luminous answers to correspondents, which were a feature of the journal, clings to our memory. It was as follows:

ANNIE.—The only remedy we know for singing flat is to sing sharper.

It may be interesting here to recall the names of some of the other alumni of the Academy besides the pupils of Mr. Corder mentioned above who have achieved public reputation in various ways:

FEMALE STUDENTS.

Lena Ashwell, Mathilde Bauermeister, Dora Bright, Mary Davies, Agnes Larkcom, Kate Loder, C. A. Macirone, Marian McKenzie, Julia Neilson, Charlotte Sainton-Dolby, Clara Samuel, Charlotte Thudichum, Alwina Valleria, Maude Valérie White, Hilda Wilson, Edith Wynne, and Agnes Zimmermann.

MALE STUDENTS.

H. C. Banister, Joseph Barnby, John Francis Barnett, Hubert Bath, Arnold Bax, G. J. Bennett, William Sterndale Bennett, Henry Blagrove, Philip Brozel, Frederick Corder, J. S. Curwen, William G. Cusins, Ben Davies, F. G. Edwards, Eaton Faning, Harry Farjeon, Edward German, C. H. Allen Gill, Thomas Harper, W. H. Holmes, John Hullah, Charles Lucas, George A. Macfarren, Walter Macfarren, W. G. McNaught, Alexander C. Mackenzie, Tobias A. Matthey, Arthur O'Leary, Arthur W. Payne, Brinley Richards, William Shakespeare, Charles Steggall, Arthur Sullivan, Arthur Goring Thomas, John Thomas, William Wallace, Frederick Westlake, Thomas Wingham, Henry J. Wood.

MR. F. W. RENAUT.
Secretary.

On the business side the institution is very fortunate in having as its honorary chairman of the Committee of Management, Mr. Alderman Edward E. Cooper, and as its honorary treasurer, Mr. C. E. Rube, both of whom are musical amateurs and City men of high standing. To complete our reference to the principal members of the staff, we include the name of Mr. F. W. Renaut, who has been secretary since October, 1891.

During the last twenty years the Academy has been favoured by the gift of numerous scholarships and exhibitions. The prospectus now enumerates fifty-eight of these aids to students, some of which are very substantial. The most notable and generous gift was that of the late Mrs. Ada Lewis in 1901, when, at a capital cost of £18,000, fifteen perpetual scholarships were endowed. These scholarships are for three years' education, and, therefore, five are awarded every year.

Another gift of great value and utility was that bestowed in 1903 by the family of the late Mrs. Angelina Goetz. It consists of a library of five hundred modern full scores—many of them unpurchasable. These scores may be consulted not only by the students, but, under certain easy conditions, also by the general public.

Some years ago a new departure was made in the establishment of a dramatic and elocutionary course for students who desired to adopt the stage as a profession. This class has given public dramatic performances in addition to those given by the previously established operatic class.

We cannot here give an exhaustive list of the numerous activities of the Academy, but one strong educational feature deserves special mention. This is the two weekly orchestral practices, at which standard and modern works are rehearsed, and advanced students are afforded the opportunity of preparing themselves for public life by playing or singing with the band. The fortnightly concerts are conducted also with this view, and the terminal orchestral concerts are devoted entirely to the appearance of students and to the production of their compositions.

Elsewhere in our present issue (p. 588) we give some details of a scheme just instituted by the Academy for the training of teachers. This departure is an important one and, if it is supported as it should be, will do much to raise the standard of teaching in this country. It is a gain to find teaching recognised in a great music school as a science based on psychology.

With our August issue we presented an illustration of the external appearance of the new Academy, reproduced from the design of the architects (Messrs. Ernest George & Yeates). The site is in Marylebone Road, almost at the corner of York Gate, Regent's Park, and nearly facing Marylebone Church and within a short distance of Baker Street railway station, via which practically all London and the suburbs can be reached without quitting cover. The building (which has been erected by the contractors, Messrs. G. E. Wallis & Sons, of Maidstone) consists of a central block with two wings. The east wing contains the concert-hall, 122 feet long and 45 feet wide, estimated to accommodate an audience of about a thousand persons. It contains—or will soon—a fine organ by Messrs. Norman & Beard, the gift of Mrs. Threlfall in memory of her late husband, who, as already stated above, was for some years the chairman of the Committee of Management. The main building contains about fifty class-rooms, in the construction of which the latest devices for deadening sound outside the rooms have been adopted. There are double doors to all the teaching rooms. The west wing is devoted to offices, libraries, &c., and there is ample dining room accommodation in the basement, and two practice organs on the top floors are placed well out of hearing. The entrance leads to a marble hall where, in the centre of a tessellated pavement, and surrounded by a wreath, is inscribed the motto of the Academy, comprising (says Mr. Corder in his description, from which some of the foregoing details are taken) in three brief words the whole of human wisdom: 'SING UNTO GOD.'

The Autumn term, commencing September 23, will be held in the new building.

The new Royal Academy of Music is a monument of the industry, courage and sacrifice of many devoted apostles of the Art. That the special facilities for carrying on its great work that are now provided will enable the institution to prosper exceedingly, will be the hope of thousands of well-wishers.

REFLECTIONS ON BAYREUTH.

BY ERNEST NEWMAN.

I suppose nearly every one comes away from Bayreuth saying that he will never go again; yet somehow or other he does return. When we are there we are perhaps abnormally sensitive to the many discomforts and inconveniences of the whole business,—the excessive amount of travelling necessary in order to get a few hours of music, the generally unsatisfactory nature of one's rooms, the coarse and heavy German fare that the restaurants provide for us, the enervating heat, the imperfect ventilation of the theatre, the wretched quality of a good deal of the singing, the debauch of atrocious Wagnerian 'art'—engravings, photographs, busts, Graal-cups, and so on—that makes every other shop-window an offence to the eye. Most of us come away swearing that the balance of æsthetic pleasure we bring away with us is not worth the expenditure of time, trouble, and money, and that this is certainly our last Bayreuth; yet a year or two afterwards we shall probably be found willing to endure it all again. I need not pause to analyse the secret of this hold that Bayreuth has upon us; every one, whether he has been there or not, realises that it is Wagner, even more than Wagner's art, that draws us there,—that in Bayreuth we feel, as we do nowhere else on earth, the conquering might of this man and his profound and justifiable belief in himself. And so, though this year I personally came away exhausted with the cruel heat, and irritated at the deplorable quality of certain features of the performances, and swearing that never, no never, &c., &c., I am pretty certain to make the pilgrimage again before long. Only I shall wait until Bayreuth is in other hands; Wagner plus wild horses will not drag me to another performance that is controlled by the present members of the family. I don't want to lose all my admiration for Wagner just yet. Of this, however, more anon.

Bayreuth becomes a jollier and jollier place the less serious your intentions are. It must be heaven for the mere flâneur, out simply for food and drink and sunlight and conversation and pretty dresses, with the music thrown in in the evenings. But if you really want to think very hard about anything you must keep out of the crowd; and to the young student who wants to think hard about that amazing bundle of problems that we call Wagner I would say, 'Go by yourself and keep as much as you can to yourself, or to one or two kindred spirits.' The best way to get the full emotional value out of Bayreuth is to avoid the noisy, cosmopolitan restaurants, with their ceaseless chatter and clatter,—to take a few biscuits with you and munch them in the more solitary parts of the woods between the Acts, and to make a quiet meal at home at the end of the performance. The student has to choose between this Spartan self-denial plus the full effect of the music-dramas, and a week of social merriment minus a good deal of the effect of what he has heard in the theatre. Perhaps, however, I ought not to dogmatise

I have tried both plans myself, and no doubt if the ascetic and the carnal ideals were put before me in blunt antithesis for my choice, I should be weak enough to plump for the latter. It is certainly good to have some one to talk to at times, either to communicate the overflow of your enthusiasm or to work off in strong language the fury that some of the things they do at Bayreuth arouse in you. And this last time, at any rate, our own little party was so harmonious and so jolly that one very readily gave up the reflective ideal,—even if the appalling heat would have permitted much reflection. We felt no shame, though perhaps we should have done, in telling the Wagnerian stories in Limericks at supper. The Wagner Association held its solemn and sacred meetings nightly in the same restaurant. I hope no breath of these Limericks reached the chaste ears of the members. Perhaps the hot weather was answerable for this aberration, and for the disrespectful description of Mime, by a young and irrepressible member of the party, as ‘one of the Nibs.’ Anyhow, this is the effect the holy air of Bayreuth has upon some people.

But, after bad performances, disappointed and disillusioned men may be forgiven anything; and frankly, some of the things we heard at the first cycle this year were maddeningly bad. It was as well for the security of the theatre and of Villa Wahnfried that other things were extremely good. No one who saw it will ever forget the picture that greeted his astonished eyes when the curtain rolled back and showed the setting of the third Act of the ‘Meistersinger,’ with the spacious meadow in front and the complete circuit of the old walled and battlemented city in the background. I have never seen any stage picture that came so near to making you feel that it had a soul. Now and again, too, we got that peculiar pleasure that Bayreuth seems to give us more abundantly than any other theatre,—the delight given by the perfect correspondence of the music and the gestures. The best example, perhaps, was in the untying of Alberich’s bonds by Loge in the ‘Rhinegold,’ where each right-and-left fling of the rope seemed the exact material counterpart of the darting phrases in the orchestra. But Bayreuth always rides a good principle to death. In some of its attempts to achieve this synchronism of gesture and tone it becomes ludicrously wooden and mechanical. In the final scene of the ‘Valkyrie,’ for instance, Brynhilde had evidently been taught at two points to raise her hands slowly above her head, the full stretch to be reached each time at the climax of the phrase. The melody, however, is so long and slow that a gradual uplifting of the arms was impossible; so what we had was a series of jerks and pauses, with the hands coming into final position with a kind of click as the theme touched its highest point. We do not mind the doll in ‘Les Contes d’Hoffmann’ behaving like an automaton, but we would rather Brynhilde did not do it. The Bayreuth intelligence strikes one, generally speaking, as a kind of cupboard that has had all sorts of things,—jewels and rubbish,—pitched into it at random for many years; it badly wants emptying and the contents sorting out by some vigorous and unsparing hand. As it is, we can safely say that there is no performance at Bayreuth that gives you complete pleasure; if one thing is right, another is wrong,—and wrong in a way that could be so easily altered. This year the most harmonious performances as a whole were those of the ‘Rhinegold’ and the ‘Meistersinger.’ In the latter no one was quite first-rate with the exception of Heinrich Schultz as Beckmesser. (Schultz, we were told, was formerly a chorus-singer at Weimar. He made as good a Beckmesser as I have ever seen, managing to be humorous without a suspicion of the usual clownishness.) But all the chief singers were young, and the opera had throughout the spirit of youthfulness that suits. The orchestra, too, under Richter, was admirable. Each of the other performances was largely spoiled by singing of the most wretched description. ‘Parsifal’ was ruined, for me, at any rate, by Van Dyck. His first entrance upon the stage was enough to disillusionise the least questioning of the faithful. Instead of the slender, unsophisticated boy we expected, there bounced on to the stage a mature and bulky personage who looked more like Friar Tuck than Parsifal, who made some of the queerest noises with his throat, and who posed all through the evening with the usual self-assurance of the popular tenor. Anything less like Parsifal I could hardly imagine. Why does Bayreuth do these things? Does it suppose that its visitors are so ignorant of singing, of acting, and of Wagner as not to resent being compelled to sit through an experience of this kind? Will it never recognise that it does not follow that because an actress sang a part well some fifteen or twenty years ago a younger singer could not sing it better now? This year not all the intelligence of some of the women could reconcile us to the failure, or partial failure, of their voices; what pleasure can a singer’s long experience of a part give us, if she has a voice that you could shave with? Why should people be asked to travel a thousand miles to hear anything but the best singing it is possible to get? I would not be misunderstood. I have no prejudice against the venerable ladies to whom Bayreuth thinks fit to entrust some of the great Wagnerian parts. I would gladly see them sitting in the theatre, surrounded by their grandchildren. But to hear them sing,—no, that I will never willingly do again.

And the men are often far worse even than the women. I should have thought that the climax had been reached with Van Dyck in ‘Parsifal’; but Jakob Urlus, as Siegmund, was worse still, and Von Bary, as Siegfried, an easy winner even over Urlus. The German Sprechgesang is bad enough at any time, but that of Von Bary is sometimes more than any one constituted like myself can stand. The Sprechgesang, I suspect, was the invention of some one who, being unable to sing, managed to persuade other people that speaking was better,—just as the fox who had had his tail taken off in the trap argued so convincingly that the stump was a more dignified organ than the full tail, that all the other foxes cut off theirs at once. I do not know what the average German thinks of it; but the average musical Englishman would rather have ten minutes' decent singing than ten hours of the shouting, and barking, and yelping through the nose that we have to endure from some of the Bayreuth tenors and baritones. Again I ask, Why does Bayreuth treat us like this? If the Wagner family do not know the difference between good singing and bad, they are not fit to have control of Bayreuth, and the sooner the theatre passes out of their hands the better for it, for us, and for Wagner's reputation. If they do know the difference, yet deliberately fob us off with exhibitions of incompetence of this kind, the least one can say is that it is hardly cricket. They might remember that we subscribe to Bayreuth months in advance, without knowing the name of a single one of the conductors or singers. Villa Wahnfried might reflect that if we trust it so frankly its duty is not to abuse our trust as sadly as it sometimes does. With all the world to choose from, singers for Bayreuth ought to be selected for other qualifications than their appetite for blacking. But until a perception of their duty to the musical world dawns upon the Wagner family, intending English visitors would do well to insist upon knowing the names of the proposed singers before they take their tickets. I can conceive no greater annoyance than to buy your programme an hour or so before the performance, and to discover that you have gone all that way simply to hear no better Parsifal than a Van Dyck, or no better Siegfried than a Von Bary.

Against these distressing experiences there were a few more agreeable ones to be set. The Mime of Hans Breuer was as finished as ever. Lieban is better in one or two respects; but Lieban was built for Mime, and hardly needs to play it. Breuer is really a very burly man, which makes it all the more wonderful that he should simulate smallness and weakness so well as he does; in certain moments, as when he pulled at the rope of the forge-bellows and, holding on a second too long, seemed almost to be lifted off his feet by the rope as it went back, you would have sworn there was not the strength of a fly in the man's body. Altogether Breuer was a delight from first to last. Walter Soomer, as Wotan, was always dignified and sonorous. The Loge (Heinrich Hensel) would have been first-rate but for a suspicion of stiffness in his movements. The Alberich (Habich), Gunther (Weil) and Hagen (Braun) were all above the average. Anna Bahr-Mildenburg was a clumsy Kundry, but, as those who have seen her in 'Elektra' will agree, an artist with the unmistakable grand manner. Saltzmann-Stevens, as Sieglinde, looked very charming but sang disappointingly; perhaps the solemnity of a first appearance at Bayreuth was too much for her. The scenery was, as usual, a mixture of the bad and the superlatively good; 'Parsifal' was magnificently done, but some of the sets in the 'Ring' were in the old flat, uninteresting style. The mechanics of the performances,—the lighting, and so on—were generally excellent, though now and again a stupid thing was done. When Siegfried, for example, came to throw the slain Mime into the dragon's cave, the bundle of rags he picked up was so unmistakably smaller than the real Mime that a titter went round the theatre. Death surely does not waste the body so rapidly as this!

Karl Muck conducted 'Parsifal,' and Siegfried Wagner the 'Ring,' much to my regret,—for Siegfried is rarely more than a passable conductor, and is generally a rather poor one. With his nerveless, unrhymic phrasing he comes nearer to making his father's music seem dull than one would have thought possible. No one admires Wagner as a musician more than I do; but I confess that this time, what with the lifeless conducting and the bad singing, I felt more frequently bored in the 'Ring' than I liked to admit to myself. So intense was this feeling towards the end of the fourth day that I stayed outside during the second Act of the 'Götterdämmerung.' I understood, for the first time, how it is that people can sometimes go to Bayreuth Wagnerians and return anti-Wagnerians; I could realise from my own experience something of what Debussy felt on his memorable visit. The bad ventilation of the theatre, the irregular meals one has to put up with, the fatiguing heat,—these and other things tend to produce physical and mental weariness; and if the performance is not good at every point one begins to feel disillusioned here and there with regard to the music. A few of the phrases struck me this time as being on a par with some of the sententious, platitudinous lines in Shakespeare that are always applauded by the gallery and always set the literary critic's teeth on edge. Perhaps the point has gone out of the lines through endless repetition; perhaps there was never much point in them. Once or twice I was horrified to catch myself finding a touch of commonplace in certain passages in the 'Ring' that I had hitherto greatly admired. No doubt it was mostly Siegfried Wagner's fault. A man cannot be too careful in the choice of his children. On the whole I should say that, staging apart, two-thirds of the performances were not worth so long a journey and so much expense. And yet—Bayreuth is Bayreuth, and I shall certainly go again some day, but not until the Wagner theatre is run on purely artistic lines.

THE NEW 'WAGNER-LISZT.'

By WILLIAM ASHTON ELLIS.

II.

To pursue another of the many possibilities of research in this restored edition of the famous Correspondence, one of the first things to strike the observant is the belated appearance of a proper name only met in previous versions under the disguise of a single initial, now 'B.', now 'H.', or at times a mere 'X'. As in most cases that disguise had been easy to penetrate, of far greater moment is the discovery that the allusions themselves—to Hans von Bülow, of course—are more than doubled in actual number now, to say nothing of interest and length. Excepting the case I shall deal with toward the close of this article, they may not add much to the material knowledge of those who have studied von Bülow's own voluminous and racy correspondence; yet it is attractive to learn at first hand, for example, the estimate formed of such a junior's character and talents by two elders of the rank and experience of Wagner and Liszt. Here, then, to start with, is a whole new epistle demanding no comment:

CHERISHED FRIEND,—In all briefness to-day a petition that concerns someone else.

Young Bülow is in Switzerland; he has the most pronounced abilities and the most ardent proved passion for music. His mother wishes him in any event to complete his Legal studies before deciding on Music for good; but as he has a deadly hate of Jurisprudence, his sacrifice would be quite useless, and simply injurious to him.—Now, I have procured young Ritter, Bülow's bosom-friend, the post of Musikdirector at our little theatre here for the coming winter season, in return for which I naturally had to give my personal guarantee of his efficiency; he will therefore be learning the strict practical side of conducting under my supervision and guidance. I have offered Bülow to go shares with Ritter, so that they may profit in common by this certainly not unfavourable opportunity of training. The only thing that stands in Bülow's light is the question of his mother's consent; I have just written her at some length,* and plainly demonstrated to her—as I think—the folly of her maternal coercion. So Bülow now hopes everything from your kindness, if you would further let his mother know your approbation of his wish, perhaps also promise him all the protection in your power. Myself, too, I heartily beg it of you.—

Farewell, most excellent of all the friends the world has ever seen.

Eternally thine,

RICHARD WAGNER.

Zurich, 19. Sept. 50.

Liszt wrote the begged lines, as we now learn from his own pen. His mother still objecting, the young man took the bit between his teeth and jumped at Wagner's offer; but local complications soon ended the most invaluable lesson in his whole artistic life, as foreshadowed in the following extract from a new passage in Wagner's letter of November 25:

Bülow is proving exceptionally good—so much so, that I'm almost anized at the rapid development of his brilliant abilities; but the rank vulgarity and impudence of the comedians gives him—and consequently myself—a deal to do, and I wouldn't bargain that my patience doesn't break down one of these days and put an end to the enforced odious contact with these people. In that case I'm concerned for Bülow, who has learnt an uncommon deal in this short time, it is true, but would be seriously interrupted in his career for the nonce.

Another restoration in a letter of just a month later, December 24, 1850, again is eloquent of that fatherly interest in the rising generation displayed throughout his life by Wagner, equally with Liszt, and given voice at this very period in 'Opera and Drama,' where we read: 'We are seniors and juniors; let the senior not think of himself, but love the junior for the bequest he sinks into his heart for fresh increasing':—

I wrote you last time that I had to fear a speedy rupture of Bülow's relations with the small theatre here. The case has since occurred where it no longer was compatible with his or my honour to remain in connection with that theatre. So I have been in some concern for this extremely talented young artist, towards whom, unfortunately, his mother is still implacable in respect of his musical career. Of course I should never back up Bülow in his renitence, if I were not firmly convinced—particularly after observing his unusual qualification for an orchestral conductor—that it would be a sin against himself and art not to support him in his emphatic inclination and resolve for Music. By good luck it just happened that an offer of engagement as Musikdirector reached him from St. Gallen in the nick of time; with young Ritter, who likewise wants to practise conducting, he has departed thither, and seems getting on well. Only, this is a very short-lived undertaking, and I feel it my incumbent duty to ask you in the friendliest manner if your circumstances perhaps might permit you to find Bülow a small sphere of action under your own wing at Weimar, or if it would be possible for you to recommend him elsewhere?—You would much relieve my heart if you were to share my solicitude for this highly-promising young man.

Liszt took over Bülow's tutelage next summer, but as pianoforte pupil (of course, gratis), thus diverting this junior for many a year from the channel which his farther-sighted friend and guardian had first mapped out. We have a few small restorations regarding his progress as virtuoso on Liszt's side of the Briefwechsel, but may pass to an incident that, arising from quite another aspect of the young man's talents, is now proved to have hampered him a great deal more than earlier editions had let us suspect. That incident was his diatribe against Henriette Sontag—then displaying her resuscitated charms upon the operatic stage of Europe as middle-aged soubrette—in the Neue Zeitschrift of February 13, 1852. Two or three weeks thereafter, as we knew already, Wagner wrote Liszt:

That it was possible for Bülow's article on the Sonntag [sic] to create such a terrible stir among you people, corroborates my opinion of the very low ebb at which our art and public stand now.

But what we did not know before, from this Correspondence at least, was the enduring effect of the said Sontag-article and its successors on the young man's standing with the very firm that at last has been brave enough to sanction a whole group of restorations concerning that ancient 'bad odour' in a collection of letters originally and still published by itself. The first of them appears in Liszt's letter to Wagner of December 13, 1853, regarding a few selections from 'Lohengrin' which its composer had given Hans to arrange as pianoforte solos:

Touching the Lohengrin piano-pieces, I believe Härtel refuses to publish them for simple reason of their bearing Hans' name. I should think this antipathy would not last long, especially if Hans makes his appearance at Leipzig [as pianist] with the same success he has just had in Berlin. . . . But in case Hans were unable to arrive at his Leipzig début as virtuoso under favourable auspices, or should it have to be put off for a while, I make you the following proposition:—Send me the 6 Lohengrin pieces exactly as you have marked them out, and I gladly will polish them up and place at your disposal the fee which Härtel gives me for them. Should you prefer the pieces to appear under your own name, however, it is all the same to me, and in that case Härtel is sure to publish them at once. Hans' articles in Brendel's paper [N.Zf.] have done him a deal of harm among the 'moderate progress' folk at Leipzig, and he has little in the way of bonbons to expect from that quarter. Nevertheless, I am convinced he will attain a most honoured position as artist soon, since he has all the stuff for it and is a magnificent, extremely gifted, and out-and-out good fellow.—

Wagner's reply of December 17, 1853, is likewise adorned with a restitution, the effective part of which I reproduce :

I should have liked Bülów to earn something. If Härtels will publish his transcriptions without his (proscribed!) name, as 'authorised' by the composer, and pay for them,—that end would be gained. But if they will only pay upon condition that you lend your name, I here put in a word for Bülów, and entreat you to revise and sign his labours, that he may come by a little reward. You misunderstood me, when you believed you must hand me the fee for anything similar.—However, you'll soon be seeing Hans at Leipzig ; so please arrange it with him then. Shew Härtels my excerpts for voice as well, tho', that these people may at least see what it all was about (! !).

Wagner's vocal excerpts from 'Lohengrin' were duly accepted, and paid for, but Hans's visit to Leipzig in January, 1854, the reverse of mended matters in his own case. For it led to a 'scene in Härtel's office' (see 'Life of Wagner,' iv., 472), the result of which we learn in a letter from Liszt to Wagner of a year and a half later, June 2, 1855, where a sentence, 'If the 4-hand arrangement of the "Faust" overture is already made, I do not advise you to suggest anyone else for it' is now completed thus, 'particularly not Bülów, to whom Härtel personally declared that he would not tolerate his name upon their lists.' And indeed, for a whole six years from that unlucky Sontag-article did von Bülów remain on the Härtels' bad books, till Wagner's own persuasive powers at last removed him thence—as follows :

In vol. i. of 'R. Wagner's Briefwechsel mit seinen Verlegern,' published early this year, we find the composer of 'Tristan' writing Härtels, January 4, 1858 :

I have delegated to Herr von Bülów, with quite peculiar confidence, the making of the vocal score ; it shall be a model, and above all, not too difficult. The same gentleman will undertake the pianoforte scores without words, for 2 and 4 hands, and I will see to their turning out particularly sensible and practical . . .

In the Wagner-Liszt Correspondence this is capped by a tiny restoration to the composer's letter of January 24 : 'Bülów must arrange,' in itself suggesting that Dr. Härtel's reply of the 14th (now mislaid) still showed that young man the cold shoulder ; a conjecture borne out by a further passage in the Wagner-Härtel correspondence, where, under date February 27, Wagner observes :

As regards Bülów—who unfortunately still seems to be objectionable to you from former days—I should be heartily pleased if you were not averse to a rapprochement from his side on this occasion. What may have annoyed you in him were certainly mere traits of youthful petulance, which soften down in every reasonable person with lapse of time ; but his talent is so considerable, and his musical abilities are of such a kind, that a friendly attitude towards him will not, I feel sure, be without interest to yourselves as well some day. However, everything connected with our transaction shall pass through my own hands for the present—in accord with your wish—so that you will have to look to me for whatever he supplies.

So the Härtel-Bülów hatchet was buried at last, and the world made richer, among other things, by those wonderful pianoforte scores of 'Tristan.' Yet our new 'Wagner-Liszt' most unexpectedly reveals how very near it came, soon after the above, to the transference of that task to another amid an all-round welter of bad blood. For it is here we reach elucidation of the entirely baffling 'X' in letters 262-63, of the earlier editions. There letter 262, 'Zurich, July 8, 1858,' had commenced with 'This affair of T. and X., dearest Franz, has become very significant to me,' and so on, leaving us altogether in the dark as to the nature of certain cryptic 'charges' just laid at Tausig's door by Liszt,—an instance of indifferent editing in the past, since the suppression, if called for at all, should have been carried much farther. It is with a sense of great relief, then, that we greet this new edition's restoration of the actual opening of that letter from Wagner dated '8. Juli 58,' as under :

DEAREST FRANZ,—Our letters have crossed. For to-day merely a couple of lines as to your suspicion of Tausig. The latter has imparted to me your admonition dealt him re his alleged ingratitude toward Bülów. This incident has truly afflicted me, since it has made me acquainted with a palpable weakness in the character of our good Hans, which I've made no bones of telling him about. The truth of the matter is, briefly, as follows. Hans had promised me to complete the vocal score of the Iphigenia [W.'s revision of Gluck's 'Iph. in Aulis'] quickly ; as he was a very long time about it, and on the other hand I had given Härtels the strictest assurance of Hans's punctuality in the execution of the arrangements of Tristan, I debated with myself anew whether it wasn't altogether wrong to saddle Bülów with such tasks, despite his zeal for me. For one thing was plain to me, namely, that Hans is so very much occupied that he couldn't even bring off labours undertaken with alacrity without being driven. Had I to include in the occupations detaining him productive efforts of his own, compositions and the like, I should feel uncomfortable about prodding him up ; as it is, however, I cannot but assume that pianoforte arrangements of this sort, for which in themselves he cannot find time, must rob him of the last moment for works of his own. And in that I recognised a decided ground of self-reproach which had prompted me to delegate the transposing of the Nibelungen to Kindworth once before, since Hans was in just the same position even then, unable to get on with a Tannhäuser pianoforte score without words which he had undertaken ; whereas Kindworth, relinquishing any career as composer, and moreover only giving a few lessons at that time, caused me far less reluctance than Hans with his energy already so greatly split up. So I wrote him quite candidly to this effect a little while ago, to Weimar (where he happened to be staying with you [latter half of May]), and besought him not to split his energy still further, even under the impulse of zeal for myself, but to afford me instead the great joy of soon hearing of fresh productive labours on his own account.—The answer I received to that distressed me much ; for I saw that Hans deemed me dishonest in my assignment of motives for my action, and openly imputed that in any case I had been influenced either by the importunity of Tausig—who, he said, was always in a fix for money—or by insinuations from the Altenburg (I beg you—strictly entre nous, this!). The latter supposition in particular made me perfectly wretched, as it convinced me that policy and diplomacy had come to a head in the downright wrong place. I frankly told Hans of this feeling, and how grieved I was that he should have already got the length of believing he must think even myself not sincere, as nothing was more repugnant to me than to see my motives attributed to that sort of foreign and disfiguring influences. Just as little as any instigation to my proposal to let Tausig arrange the Tristan had come to me from the Altenburg, I said, had Tausig urged me to it ; but—as I assured him once more—it was simply nothing save my care for Hans himself, quite lately re-aroused in me by his surprising delay with the Iphigenia ; from which in itself

I concluded that he was much too fully and drudgingly occupied. But as I perceived from his answer what a very special value he attached to the task for my Tristan—I added,—it went without saying, that he should retain it.

I could have wished Hans had let you know of that letter as well, were it only to have spared Tausig a reproach so extremely unjust in this instance. The latter had wanted to study what I've finished of the Young Siegfried, and fell to and commenced a piano score of its first act for that purpose. It was this work of his that gave me the idea—on the suppositions just told you in Bülow's regard—of offering him the Tristan; he undertook it with hesitance, and only on the understanding that Bülow, on whose horns he wouldn't tread for anything, should let go of the work willingly. Of an honorarium for it, under any circumstances, he refused point blank to hear; just as he has never let myself observe his being in a money difficulty.

At this point, not before, we reach what constitutes the opening of letter 262 in the earlier editions; but to that well-known commencement itself there now stands added the genuine completion of the sentence 'It was absolutely terrible to me to read your charges against T.,' as follows:

especially that of ingratitude and treachery toward Bülow, to whom he owes so much, and who has given myself such striking proofs of his devotion in the last 10 years that this behaviour must needs appear to him most undeservedly mortifying.

Stripped at last of its uncanny cloak of mystery, then as now, this little tiff was soon smoothed down, and three years afterwards we find Liszt writing Wagner (July 7, 1861): 'Of course, you will put up in my rooms at the Altenburg, where Hans and Tausig are also quartered.' But in the meantime a far more serious misunderstanding, again involving 'Tristan' in its ambit, had arisen between the two masters themselves. The strong light shed by our new edition upon that must form the subject of my final article.

(To be concluded.)

Occasional Notes.

In our June number we gave a list of the chief works to be performed at the forthcoming Three-Choir Festival, to be held at Worcester on September 10-15. The full programme, which is now issued, supplies some further details of interest. At the opening service on Sunday, September 10, Mr. Ivor Atkins's Magnificat in A and Nunc dimittis in D, Brahms's 'How lovely is Thy dwelling-place' and Psalms and a Chant by Dr. Sinclair will be the chief choral works; the last two movements from Brahms's C minor Symphony and Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch' the orchestral works. Mr. A. E. Brent Smith, organist of the service, will play Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D (the 'Doric'). The new work by Dr. Walford Davies, 'Sayings of Jesus,' to be produced on the evening of September 12, is written for tenor solo (Mr. Gervase Elwes) and chorus. Elgar's 'Go, song of mine' has been substituted for Cornelius's 'Throne of Mercy.' The programme of the concert in the Public Hall on September 13 will include Elgar's 'Coronation March,' and a new set of Variations for string orchestra by W. H. Reed. The new work by Professor Bantock to be produced at this concert is now entitled 'Overture to a Greek tragedy.' Dr. R. Vaughan Williams's 'Five mystical songs,' to be performed for the first time on the evening of September 14, are settings of poems by George Herbert and are designed for baritone solo (Mr. Campbell McInnes), chorus and orchestra. At this concert Herr Kreisler will play the Elgar Violin concerto. The climax of the Festival will be reached on the morning of September 14, when a performance of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion will be given, with the distinction of a new edition specially prepared by Sir Edward Elgar and Mr. Ivor Atkins. The violin solo obbligati will be played by Herr Kreisler, and the vocal solos will be sung by Madame Agnes Nicholls, Madame Le Mar, Madame Kirkby Lunn, Miss Sara Silvers, Mr. Gervase Elwes, Mr. Campbell McInnes, Mr. William Higley and Mr. Robert Radford. Other soloists at the Festival will be Madame Gleeson-White, Miss Alice Lakin, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. John Coates, Mr. Frederic Austin and Mr. Frederick Ranalow. The orchestral work will require the services of eight flautists and eight oboists. Mr. W. H. Reed will be principal first violin. The organ will be played by Dr. A. H. Brewer and Dr. G. R. Sinclair. Except in the cases when composers direct the performance of their own works, the conductor will be Mr. Ivor Atkins.

The programme of the Norfolk and Norwich Triennial Festival, which takes place on October 25, 26, 27 and 28, contains no new work and no unfamiliar work of importance, but is nevertheless full of interest. The larger choral works consist of Bach's Mass in B minor, Mozart's 'Requiem,' Berlioz's 'Faust,' Elgar's 'The Kingdom' (conducted by the composer), 'Lobgesang,' Dr. Walford Davies's 'Everyman' (conducted by the composer) and 'The Messiah.' The instrumental soloists are M. Ysaye, who will play the Elgar concerto, Herr Moriz Rosenthal, and Lady Speyer. The chief orchestral work is Beethoven's seventh Symphony. The vocalists are Madame Agnes Nicholls, Madame Lillian Blauvelt, Miss Ada Forrest, Madame Kirkby Lunn, Madame Ada Crossley, Miss Phyllis Lett, Miss Ellen Beck, Mr. Gervase Elwes, Mr. Herbert Hegner, Mr. Joseph Reed, Mr. Thorpe Bates and Mr. Wilfrid Douthitt. Mr. Haydon Hare is chorus-master, organist and conductor of the concluding popular concert. Sir Henry J. Wood is conductor-in-chief. This will be the thirtieth Norfolk and Norwich Festival and not, as erroneously printed in the advertisement on p. 497 of our August issue, the thirteenth.

Dr. W. H. Cummings has presented some very valuable books to the library of St. Paul's Cathedral. One is a manuscript volume containing a list of donations to the fund intended to be devoted to the repair of the old Cathedral, brought down to the year 1620, bearing the signatures of Lord Clarendon, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London and several other notable men of the time. Another volume contains the contracts made for various works in connection with the new Cathedral, and is especially interesting from the fact that the specification for the organ is signed by the celebrated Father Smith. A full account of this important historic document was contributed to the Musical Times of March, 1880, by Dr. Cummings. A fine large paper copy of 'Their Majesties Commission for the Rebuilding of the Cathedral Church of S. Paul, in London. Printed by Benj. Motte. MDCXCII,' is included in the gift made by Dr. Cummings.

The operatic enterprise of Mr. Thomas Quinlan, briefly outlined in our issue for May, has now assumed much larger dimensions, as it now includes a tour to South Africa in the winter and to Australia in the spring. The repertoire consists of 'Carmen,' 'Faust,' 'Hänsel and Gretel,' 'Madam Butterfly,' 'La Bohème,' 'L'Enfant Prodiges,' 'Tales of Hoffmann,' 'Aida,' 'Tannhäuser,' 'Lohengrin,' 'Tristan and Isolde,' 'Die Walküre,' and the 'Girl of the Golden West.' All the operas will be performed in English. What with the world-wide activities of Mr. Quinlan and Dr. Charles Harriss, and the proposed visit of a large Australian choir to a Welsh National Eisteddfod, this is becoming an age of Napoleonic musical undertakings. Mr. Quinlan's tour may not seem at first to require such elaborate business arrangements as that of the 'Sheffield' choir, but it will have to be carried out without the smoothing influences of an official and exalted social reception. We cordially wish Mr. Quinlan success both financially and artistically. The published details of the two weeks' season in Liverpool with which the English provincial tour opens in October promise a series of adequate performances.

We have so often been the victims of unauthorized and unacknowledged 'borrowing,' that we can thoroughly sympathize with the feelings of 'Lancelot,' as expressed in the Referee of August 20:

If imitation is the sincerest form of flattery, then quotation is a direct compliment. Compliments, however, are sometimes ambiguous, and I am doubtful if I ought to thank the editor of the . . . or not for so generously, week after week, circulating my views expressed in 'Matters Musical.' On the one hand, it is gratifying to know that his readers so approve of my remarks that he feels justified in printing them continuously in extenso; but, on the other hand, since he does so in separate paragraphs, and only adds the word 'Referee' after the last of the series, I am not sure whether even the astuteness of Lancashire folk may perceive that all the paragraphs, amounting to over half a column, in the issue of the 2nd inst. are by LANCELOT of the REFEE, and it seems to me that, for the benefit of his readers, he should make it clear at the commencement that the odd half-column or so is lifted from the journal he evidently so highly esteems.

Such occurrences teach us a new significance of the word 'copy'!

The widely-felt desire to strengthen the movement for preserving traditional Irish music found expression at a Conference held on August 2, in the Library of the Gaelic League, Dublin. In the course of an address in which he described the characteristics of Irish music, Mr. Carl Hardebeck said:

Attention should be devoted to inflection. Anybody who knew anything about Latin knew that in Gregorian music the melody suited exactly the Latin text. This was exactly what the composers of our Irish music did. A knowledge of Gregorian music could better than anything else lead a person to understand traditional singing, and a knowledge of traditional singing would lead a person to understand Gregorian music.

He went on to advocate, in emphatic terms, an energetic campaign in favour of pure national music, and in resistance to the 'vile influence of West Britonism.' The outcome of the Conference was the adoption of the suggestion that a Society be formed having the following among its objects:

The publication in proper form of the traditional melodies with Gaelic and English words;

The publication of original compositions with Irish words, and also instrumental compositions;

To support Irish musicians and encourage them to be national;

To publish literature explaining the Irish scale, structure, rhythm and method of singing; and to endeavour to foster the Uilleann pipes.

To instruct and organize competent teachers.

The imaginativeness of contributors to the Press is responsible occasionally for some astonishing musical history. Not long ago the following paragraph appeared in a London newspaper in which musical criticism is a prominent feature:

A LINK WITH MENDELSSOHN.

Sir Herbert Tree paid a visit to the Passmore Edwards Teachers' Orphanage, Sydenham, where he distributed the prizes. The Orphanage contains a room, now used by the boys as a work-room, in which Mendelssohn and Liszt used often to play in the days when the building was owned by Mr. Littleton. It is thought very probable that in this room Mendelssohn's famous oratorio 'Elijah' was played for the first time in England.

The Orphanage occupies what was known as Westwood House, the residence of the late Mr. Henry Littleton. Liszt first visited London in 1824, and his last visit was in 1886 when, at the invitation of Mr. Littleton, he stayed at Westwood House. Hence the legend. Mendelssohn died in 1847.

PIANOFORTE TOUCH:

A SIMPLIFICATION OF TERMS.

By R. GATTY.

If we wish to gain preciser ideas with regard to pianoforte touch, the various and somewhat indefinite expressions, such as non legato, legato-staccato, &c., can best be understood by approaching the question from the theoretical standpoint of the possibilities of pianoforte tone-production. As both the rationalist and old-fashioned schools agree* that the performer has no influence over the tone once the hammer has left the string, if we consider the matter on this common basis we shall obtain facts that will be generally acceptable. These facts fall into two categories—first as regards the volume of sound, secondly as regards its duration.

Expressed in general terms the varying degrees of volume of sound come under five general heads: very loud, loud, rather loud (or rather soft), soft, very soft. Six distinctions might be made, but it is an open question whether for practical executive purposes 'rather loud' and 'rather soft' are not synonymous terms. The musical signs for such degrees are, of course, ff, f, mf (mp), p, pp. All further sub-divisions such as may be used by the terms cres., dim., or the employment of a graduated series of signs in a passage, as pp, ppp, pppp, &c., have only a relative value, since they indicate degrees of a gradation which may be attained with precision in connexion, but certainly not independently.

Coming to the varying degrees of sound-duration, the first division is into the classes of continuous and detached tones. If we leave out of consideration the use of the sustaining pedal, the extreme of length is reached when a key is struck and held down till the sound has died away, and the extreme of shortness when the finger is raised as soon as is physically possible after the hammer has left the string. Here again five groups may be readily distinguished: very long, long, rather long (rather short), short, very short. This division will be readily recognised as applicable to isolated notes, but when we consider those struck in succession, the question of relative lengths has to be taken into consideration, and the foregoing division of sound-durations will need modification. Moreover, the question of speed assumes great importance, and necessitates a separate treatment of effects according as the velocity is high or low.

* See 'The Artist at the Piano,' p. 11. By George Woodhouse (Novello).

Considering first the question of relative lengths at a low velocity (this is, either at a slow tempo, or when the notes at a quick tempo have great time-values), the medium of duration at any given velocity will be found to be where the first sound ceases at the moment the next sound begins. It will be evident that its length can be extended or decreased with precision for any fraction of time by the use of tied notes or rests, but it is also clear that this precision belongs to the nature of the musical structure, and that here we have to do with a less precise (non-rhythmical) duration that refers more to the interpretative side of the music. Hence where we are debarred from the mathematical precision of the rhythmical structure, we must express our variations of duration in general terms as in the case of sound-volume, and as was done by anticipation in that of isolated sounds. But the fact that we are now dealing with two notes instead of one admits of the insertion of another degree, thus raising the number from five to six.

It is clear that if the mean of duration is found where the first sound ceases at the moment the second sound begins, which we may term the case of 'no break,' there will be in the first place the four normal varieties of 'medium break' and 'great break' on one side, and 'medium overlapping of sound' and 'great overlapping of sound' on the other. But besides this the distinction of a 'just perceptible' or 'minimum break' is easily recognisable. To these six divisions correspond the following various musical terms and signs, according to the definitions given in the usual authorities, such as Grove's 'Dictionary,' Riemann's 'Musik-Lexikon,' &c. :

Great break	... ..	=	staccatissimo , (1)
Medium break	... ..	=	staccato , (•)
Minimum break	... ..	=	portamento (Pauer); mezzo-staccato (Grove); non legato (Riemann); ( $\overset{\frown}{\text{---}}$ )
No break	... ..	=	legato ; (no sign, or sometimes $\text{---}$ ), if this, in piano-forte music, is not always a sign of phrasing.)
Medium overlapping of sound	} $\text{---}$
Great overlapping of sound
			legatissimo ; no distinction made; no special sign.

It may be remarked in passing that the mutable (non-rhythmical) value of these terms and signs is clearly demonstrated by the passage from the 'Sonata Pathétique,' quoted in 'Grove,' where • represents a 'medium break' that varies in duration according to the length of note to which it is attached :

Martellato, 'said of notes struck or sung with especial force, and left before the expiration of the time due to them' (Grove), and defined in 'Riemann' as meaning 'with great force (arm-staccato),' is of course a forte staccato or staccatissimo touch.

For all varieties of low velocities these distinctions hold good, but it will be evident that if we gradually either increase the tempo or lessen the time-value of notes, a velocity will eventually be reached when the sounds succeed one another at such a rate that it is physically impossible to make a break between them, and portamento, staccato, and staccatissimo become merged in one swift legato. Passages taken at such a speed can only be differentiated according to the volume of sound, and the divisions come under the five sound-groupings indicated at the beginning of this article. If, however, we roughly divide these swift legato passages into loud and soft, we shall find further musical terms with which they can be equated :

Swift legato, loud = mezzo-legato; legato-staccato
Swift legato, soft = leggiero; leggiadro; leggiaramente.

Mezzo-legato, the so-called 'brilliant' touch, defined by Riemann as produced by percussion and not by pressure, and by a 'nervous' (i.e., vigorous) touch, is, apart from any speciality of tone-quality, obviously a forte legato touch, and may well be theoretically assigned to swift 'forte legato' playing, as brilliancy is properly associated with speed. On the other hand, leggiero playing, which is also produced by percussion and not by pressure, but with a light elevation of the fingers (Riemann), is especially defined in 'Grove' as applying to rapid passages and being 'usually though not invariably piano.' This is of course tantamount to the 'swift legato, soft,' with which it is equated above, and in the exceptional cases, such as Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor, where it is used with 'forte,' the term is undoubtedly a misnomer.

If these conclusions are allowed to stand, examination will disclose many passages that are really mezzo-legato or leggiero, although not called so. Two examples will suffice: the semiquavers marked 'f' at the beginning of the Vivacissimamente of the Beethoven Sonata in E flat, Op. 81A, are really to be played mezzo-legato; and the octaves marked 'pp' in the sixty-third bar after the Prestissimo in the Rondo of the 'Waldstein' Sonata are undoubtedly examples of leggiero playing.

It may further be pointed out that the direction 'non legato,' which occurs just after the Adagio in the first movement of the Beethoven Sonata in C minor, Op. 111, is best interpreted, not as a portamento indication, but as merely cancelling the slurs that accompany each pair of semiquavers just before, since at the tempo given (Allegro con brio ed appassionata) the swift legato playing is the only kind that is physically possible.

In conclusion it may be mentioned that the statement in 'Grove,' under 'Dash,' as to Beethoven distinguishing between dash and dot staccato, based on corrections by his hand of the orchestral parts of the seventh Symphony, and on a letter written in 1825 to Carl Holz about a copy of the A minor Quartet, Op. 132, in which he expressly insists 'that :

is not a matter of indifference,' should be compared with the 'Bemerkungen zu L. v. Beethoven's Klaviersonaten' which Carl Krebs furnished in 1898 to the edition of the Beethoven Sonatas, published by Breitkopf & Härtel in their collection of 'Urtexte (Original Texts) classischer Musikwerke.' In referring to original manuscripts for this edition it was found that Beethoven used dashes (1), sometimes hastily written, it is true, and looking like dots, for staccato, and dots (•) for portamento ( $\text{---}$ ). The copyist of the seventh Symphony wrote :

in the violin part, and this was changed by Beethoven into :

Similarly in the viola part :

was altered by him to :

In the original MS. of the A minor Quartet, above mentioned, the staccato is exclusively indicated by dashes and portamento (spiccato, in violin phraseology) by dots. Hence the passage in the letter is claimed to refer only to dots under a curved line,—and Beethoven is supposed to have chosen the ' as a pictorial representation of the sharper blow of the staccato pianoforte touch, reserving the ' for the soft pressure of the portamento.

THE 'ETERNAL MELODY':

AN EASTERN LEGEND.

A life spent in travelling round and over the earth teaches many unexpected things, and gives glimpses of the most unsuspected wheels within the wheels of our ken. I first came in contact with the 'Eternal Melody' through some chance-overheard, whispered sentences in a bazaar in Northern Persia.

No more than a few, low words, muttered by a passing priest to one of his disciples, but, I happened to catch the phrase—'Eternal Melody,' and also to note the expression on the priest's face, one almost of fear; and my interest was roused and memory dinted. However, I could gather no more information or even a shadow of interest in the subject at that time, and life's work calling me to other parts, I had practically pigeon-holed it as a delightful theme whose study was ended prematurely, soon after its birth. Two years afterwards I was to get nearer the heart of this 'Melody,' and in what way it sounded to me this second time I will tell in full.

A spare week at Penang with many friends is not difficult to live through, and though the weather was hot, yet the ships were in and I was delighted at the prospect of two days' outing, taking camp with us, and as much ammunition and cold tea as we could carry.

Birds rose plentiful and well that first day, and we had a hard, hot melée through the paddy fields to a small 'island' of huts and cocoanut palms, under which latter we proposed to camp the night.

We had taken three rather respectable Malayan coolies with us as bearers, and these spread out our rugs and pitched our tent in no time, whilst we lay with much sleepy satisfaction on the grass, sucking fresh cocoanut milk and smoking our pipes. We had the evening meal quite early, being tired and entirely ready for sleep, and intending an early start on the morrow, so about 9 o'clock the conversation had snuffed out under drowsy 'Good-nights.'

It was certainly warm, but I dozed off almost at once and cannot say how long I slept before I was awakened by the low voices of the coolie bearers outside, engaged in a conversation of much import, judging by the accentuated tones and solemnity of their accents.

I think we must have been ready to wake quickly despite our tired bodies, for though the natives would in no way have molested us, yet one gets in the habit of sleeping with one ear open in tropical climes. Be this as it may, one of my companions also awoke, and swearing softly, complained of the mosquitos, when, becoming aware of the voices he listened until sure that it was only the coolies, and then uplifted his voice in denunciation, aided by a boot from under the tent.

'What were they jabbering about?' I asked sleepily, for I thought they might have been disturbed by some unfriendly power outside, and I knew my friend was well up in coolie patois.

'Oh! something about some infernal melody, as far as I gathered, but if they attempt to sing I shall probably shoot them.—Goo'-night.'

I lay for quite two minutes with my mind gradually getting clearer and clearer, all the time saying over and over again, 'Infernal Melody,' 'Eternal Melody,' until I was wide awake and trying to reason out a connection between these two. Had another glimpse of this unsought subject, stored away for so long, been given to me? What made me think so I cannot tell, but it should yield something this time if I could wrest it from the natives.

The next morning I took A. aside—my awakened companion of the night—and asked him to act as interpreter for me without asking me any questions or repeating my request, which he having willingly acceded to, the coolies were called and my examination began.

It would be waste of time to give the conversation in full, but at the mention of the words 'Eternal Melody' all three of them looked horribly scared and shook their heads as though to deny any knowledge.

I assured them, through A., that their conversation had all been heard, and shooting a random dart, I told them that I was waiting to hear 'the Melody.' At this they gazed at me in pure stupefaction, and were unable to speak for some time, eyeing each other the while with questioning eyes, half filled with sad amazement and half of doubt.

In the end I got little or nothing from them except that the 'Eternal Melody' had been heard in the tiny village last evening; and then they absolutely refused to say another word, becoming merely sulky and fidgety, at which A. suggested I should 'stop rotting the poor devils, and let's get on.'

As we were about to start off, a wailing as of several voices uprose from the huts, and we saw white figures passing to and fro as if in trouble; but not a word could we get from the coolies as to the cause, and they only eyed me with considerable fear.

Nothing further of note happened during this 'melodic' episode, and thus for the second time the subject was blocked.

And now I will pass to the third and last time of my life when I was to touch the problematic string of the 'Eternal Melody.'

Whilst staying in Peking, about eighteen months ago, during such spare time as my duty allowed me, I was studying the ethics and idiosyncrasies of Chinese music, and had much wanted to meet the president of the Yō-Poo, or board of music, a division of the national Board of Rites.

My guide had thought that if it was known that a distinguished (sic) stranger was interested in musical lore, and with the aid of certain monetary outlay wherewith to approach the household servants, the audience might be arranged: but I was surprised when I was sitting in the hall of the 'Waggons-Lit' Hotel one evening, about 10 o'clock, smoking a last cigar, to hear my guide announce in my ear that our richkshas were waiting to carry us to the house of the mandarin Lew-ki, President of the Yō-Poo! Without hesitation I slipped on a thin coat and followed the guide out to the waiting richkshas.

The Chinese capital by night is perhaps in its way more absolutely enchanting than even Paris or London, and the kaleidoscope of colour and sound, the lights and shadows, and the various groupings make for incessant entertainment.

I was not paying much attention, however, that evening, and did not notice how far we had gone until the stillness and shifty darkness gave pause to wonder how our evening was going to end.

We arrived at length before an imposing gateway, some distance outside the city, and immediately upon our drawing up the gates were thrown back, and a brilliantly dressed figure beckoned to us to enter.

Telling the rickshas to wait, I passed in, followed by my guide, and the gorgeous one led us across a long courtyard, fringed with fir trees and lighted only by a small Chinese lantern, hanging over a doorway at the far end.

Through this doorway we were conducted, and I was ushered into a large room, comically European and decoratively Chinese, with a faint smell of burning 'joss-stick' hanging upon the air; and here we were invited to remain until the great one would see us. I was admiring some exquisite carving on a small side table, when the door again opened and in came the smallest and oldest Chinese that I had ever seen, dressed quite plainly though handsomely in dark blue silk brocade, and wearing a small round black hat with the red mandarin's button.

The guide and myself bowed on his entrance, the former doing acrobatic marvels which I was incapable of imitating, and the mandarin returned our salute and announced he was most honoured that his humble roof should welcome such a distinguished visitor.

I made appropriate reply as to the magnificence of his house and the utter unworthiness of myself, and after about ten minutes of this exhausting game of adjectives, I started in on some questions which I really wanted to know about.

Now I have knowledge of certain musical terms in Chinese, and know the names of the scale in that language, so that it was not long before the guide was left out of the conversation, my host also having some small store of English, and being withal a most accomplished artist at the translation of ideas into the language of the hands.

We warmed to each other, as enthusiasts will, and the old gentleman was really delighted that anyone knew so much of his beloved music, and then offered to show me the treasures of musical history in his keeping. I was tremendously pleased with his suggestion, as these things were rare and not for many eyes, and so he led me through numerous passages and down many stairs until we reached a heavy, studded door which he unlocked. We then entered a circular chamber, brilliantly lighted with numerous lanterns and surrounded with shelves of instruments and various old books of ancient music and old parchments. I noticed how very hot it was in this room, and thought that it must be from its situation underground, as there were no windows at all.

We took down and examined instruments galore, I asking a hundred questions, but conscious of a growing faintness as the heat grew more insistent: also I seemed to hear a faint sound of a harp from somewhere far away, and infinitely sad were the strains, yet no air did it play that I could recognise as either European or Chinese.

I had reached to a shelf on which was one very old and yellow roll of parchment, and lifting it gently down had just seen at the top the symbol , which is the sign of Adam or 'ancestor of mankind,' when my legs seemed to give way, my head swam, and I heard the music growing louder in most wonderful sad cadences as though some great theme were about to enter, and the voice of my old host saying to me, 'Ah! I see you look upon the Eternal Melody.'

Then I remembered no more.

* * * *

'Yes,' the mandarin was saying, 'it is quite the oldest record we have, and it is verily the song that

Adam sang when the shadow of death first crossed his path; and so it is sung by the departed ones when another is about to join them from this earth of ours' We were back in the spacious room of our first meeting, and I was feeling refreshed and recovered, having rested whilst my kind host had unfolded to me many things that I would love to retell.

Looking at my watch I discovered it to be nearly 2 o'clock in the morning, so, rising, I told the guide to make my dutiful apologies for trespassing so long on the great man's time, and to return my best thanks for all his kindness and help.

And so, bowing, I left him, and we found the rickshas outside and were whirled back to the hotel—and to life. But I kept trying to regain that sad lilt which I knew to be the overture to the 'Eternal Melody.' The next evening I was shocked and much grieved to read of the death of the President of the Yö-Poo, who had suddenly died early that morning.

Whether the old man himself heard the 'Eternal Melody,' and whether I only imagined it myself, I cannot tell.

I questioned the guide on the subject, but he assured me that no white man had ever heard it; and indeed it may be so, but I wonder if perhaps one day I shall hear that great air in full harmonies to the end.

ORGANS BUILT FOR THE ROYAL PALACE OF WHITEHALL.

BY ANDREW FREEMAN.

II.—THE BANQUETING HOUSE.

So far as can be ascertained, there is no authentic record of an organ in this building previous to the Restoration, but after the accession of Charles II. it would seem that one was erected almost every year 'against Maundy Thursday.' In 'The King's Musick' there are entries relating to no less than thirteen such erections between the years 1662 and 1683, one of which may be quoted, since it concerns Father Smith. It consists of three items from Hingston's bill for £133 5s. 6d., due to him for the years 1673-5:

'To Bernard Smyth, the organ maker, for the loan of an organ for the banqueting house and for three days time ... ..	£2 0 0
'For the setting it up in the banquet-ting house ... ..	£2 0 0
'For 4 of his porters for carrying it thither ... ..	0 18 0

Had an organ been a permanent feature of the Banqueting House there would have been no need for these temporary instruments, which were evidently of quite small dimensions; indeed it is more than likely that Smith kept an instrument which he let out on hire for these and similar occasions.

But on June 28, 1698, Sir Christopher Wren was ordered to fit up the Banqueting House as a Chapel—six months after the old Chapel had been destroyed—and a few months later still, on December 2, was issued a 'Warrant to provide and set up in the new Chappell at Whitehall an organ, which the Bishop of London, Dean of his Majesty's Chappell has certified is wanting there.'<sup>22</sup> Five days later there was a 'Warrant to pay to Mr. Bernard Smith, his Majesty's organ maker, the sum of £200 which is to be advanced to him for making an organ for his Majesties Chappell at Whitehall'<sup>23</sup> and on May 5, 1699, another one to ORGAN AT ST. PETER-AD-VINCULA, TOWER OF LONDON.

(Partly re-erected, in 1891, from the Organ removed from the Banqueting House Chapel, Whitehall.)

Sir Christopher Wren 'to fit up a shed in Whitehall for Mr. Smith . . . to work in during the time he is preparing an organ' for the Chapel.<sup>24</sup> This was the instrument referred to by the London Post under date October 4, 1699, as the 'new Organ . . . with a Dial in the middle of it, the first of that make' whose counterpart was 'packt up in Boxes there' (presumably in Smith's workshop at Whitehall) preparatory to being sent to the church of St. Michael, Bridgetown, Barbados.<sup>25</sup> Its specification will be found in the Musical Times for August, 1905, and in Grove's 'Dictionary,' so that it is only necessary here to say that it consisted of three manuals, nineteen speaking stops, and 1,008 pipes.

In 1814, after having been rebuilt by Elliot, it possessed twenty stops, the additional stop probably consisting of an octave or so of pedal pipes.

Extensive alterations and additions were made in 1844 by Messrs. Hill & Son, another manual being added and the number of stop knobs being increased to thirty-seven, including four couplers and a few half-stops. The specification of the organ at this time is to be found in all three editions of Hopkins and Rimbault.

In 1877, Messrs Hill & Son altered the compass from GG (Great and Choir) and FF (Swell), to CC, the Solo manual being suppressed and a large amount of new action and pipe-work inserted.

In 1891, after the closing of the Chapel, the pipes of six of the stops were removed and inserted in the organ at the Chapel Royal, St. James's, whilst the rest of the instrument, with the exception of the Choir case (with new pipes, in place of those removed to St. James's), was re-erected in the Church of St. Peter-ad-Vincula, in the Tower of London.

Here the organ occupies a commanding position at the east end of the north aisle. Its finely carved case, which is about 24 feet high by 16 feet wide, is of dark oak, whilst its gilt front pipes are arranged in four towers (each containing three pipes) and three intermediate flats (each containing seven). Above the central flat are the Royal Arms. At least three other organs by Father Smith have almost identical cases, namely those at St. Mary-the-Great, Cambridge; Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford (with a separate Choir case in front); and Hawkesyard Park, Rugeley (formerly at Eton College Chapel).

Judging from a photograph reproduced in one of the weekly illustrated papers at the time of the closing of the Chapel, the disappearance of the separate Choir-case is not a matter for regret. It consisted of two rounded towers with three flat compartments between them, and was quite out of character with the majestic case above it. Moreover, it was not part of the original scheme, having been added at the 1844 rebuild.<sup>26</sup>

At the present time the organ contains three manuals (CC to G) and pedals (CCC to F), thirty-three speaking stops and seven couplers, &c. The stop-knobs are unusually large and clumsy in appearance, reaching almost to the tops of the jambs on either side.

III. THE QUEEN'S CHAPEL, OTHERWISE KNOWN AS THE 'POPISH CHAPPELL.'

Dr. Rimbault quotes four entries from 'Moneys received and paid for Secret Services of Charles II. and James II.,' printed for the Camden Society, the dates ranging between 1686 and 1688, from which we gather that this organ was built by Renatus Harris at a cost of over £1,100.<sup>27</sup>

<sup>26</sup> An illustration of the Banqueting House Chapel is to be found in the Penny Magazine for October, 1837. There was no separate Choir-case then—neither was there a 'dial.'

After the accession of William and Mary there was no necessity for two chapels at Whitehall. The Queen's Chapel was accordingly closed—but not immediately dismantled, for the organ remained till 1691. In this year the vestry of the church of St. James', Piccadilly (which had been consecrated in 1684), acting upon the suggestion of their Rector, the Rev. Dr. Tenison, petitioned Queen Mary to give them this organ for the use of their church. The petition was granted on August 21, 1691, and Dr. Tenison was authorised 'to remove the said organ and to employ whosoever he shall think fit to do the same.'<sup>28</sup> On December 18, was issued a 'Warrant to permit Dr. Tension, bishop-elect of Lincoln, or whoever he shall appoint, to take down the wainscot that did belong to the organ which belonged to the Popish Chappell in Whitehall, with all other necessities to the said organ.'<sup>29</sup>

The removal and re-erection were carried out by Father Smith at a cost of £120, Princess (afterwards Queen) Anne subscribing 20 guineas of the amount, and almost immediately afterwards it was improved in accordance with the suggestions of Henry Purcell and Dr. Blow. This was also done by Father Smith, the cost being £50. The specification of the organ as it was after these alterations will be found in the Musical Times for January, 1903. Here, there is only space to say that it consisted of twenty stops, distributed amongst three manuals. The compass of Great and Choir was remarkably limited—CC to C, forty-nine notes. The Echo extended from middle C to C, twenty-five notes.

In 1708 one Ambrose Warren, who had charge of the organ after the death of Father Smith, executed a few repairs, 'to the full satisfaction of all concerned, as well as myself,' but by the year 1820 the organ had become so worn as to be scarcely playable, though still a fine-toned instrument.<sup>30</sup>

In 1852 an entirely new organ was placed in the old case by Mr. J. C. Bishop, the only old pipes retained being those belonging to the Open Diapason (in front) and the metal Stopped Diapason. At the same time a separate case to contain the Choir Organ was placed in front of the gallery, Mr. C. Lee, of Golden Square, being the architect. The decoration of the pipes, &c., was entrusted to Messrs. G. & C. Bishop, heraldic painters to her Majesty.

The specification of the organ as it was after these alterations is given in all three editions of Hopkins and Rimbault, which shows that it then consisted of three manuals (CC to F) and Pedal (CCC to E), with thirty-six speaking stops, six couplers, and 2,240 pipes.

Extensive alterations were made by Messrs. Bishop & Son in February, 1898, including pneumatic action to the manuals and manual couplers, the addition of two stops to the Pedal organ, and the substitution of new stops in the place of others in other departments. The compass of the manuals and pedals was increased to G and F respectively, and a concave and parallel pedal-board fitted. The names of not a few of the stops seem to have been changed.

In December, 1901, Messrs. Bishop & Son (who still have charge of the instrument) installed the electric blowing apparatus.

At the present time there are thirty-six sounding-stops, which, with eleven couplers and accessory stops and three half-stops, bring the total number of knobs to fifty.

The instrument stands in a separate loft above the west gallery, where it has a very fine appearance. Both Great and Choir cases contain three semi-circular towers, the largest one being in the centre of the Great case, and the smallest in the centre of the Choir case. The main case has overhanging sides, in accordance with the usual custom of Renatus Harris and Father Smith, and is surmounted by four large figures of angels holding trumpets, and (over the central tower) an emblematic device. To say that the carving was the work of Grinling Gibbons is to say that it is splendid. The Choir case, though much less elaborate, is an excellent feature of the design.

(To be concluded.)

M. DENYN'S CARILLON RECITALS AT CATTISTOCK AND LOUGHBOROUGH.

On Thursday, July 27, the little village of Cattistock near to Dorchester was very much astir, for M. Denyn, the world renowned carillonneur of Malines, was giving his annual recital on the carillon in the tower of Cattistock Church. The carillon contains thirty-five bells, with a compass of three octaves, and was cast by Van Aerschoot of Louvain in 1882 (thirty-three bells), and completed by that bell-founder in 1899 (two bells). Nearly the whole of the bells and the tower were the gift of a former rector, Rev. H. Keith Barnes, although the completion in 1899 was the work of the present rector, Rev. R. P. Stickland—much to his credit. The tower was specially designed by Sir Gilbert Scott to receive the bells, and is very suggestive of Magdalen (Oxford). It is 100 ft. high, but so far as the bells are concerned the musical effect would have been even better if it could have been half as high again. In addition to the clavier (manuals and pedal) there is an automatic chime barrel of the same construction as those of Bruges and Malines, which plays tunes harmonized in three or more parts and which is set each year by M. Denyn when he comes over to give his recital. The tunes for 1911-1912 are:

'The day Thou gavest, Lord, is ended.'	} Hymns.
'Ye watchers and ye holy ones.'
'La chanson du carillonneur' (Ancient).	} Flemish.
'Notre Flandre' (Raes).

Just before 5 o'clock a large audience had assembled, many coming very long distances, including Dr. Borms (Antwerp), Mr. W. W. Starmer (Tunbridge Wells), Mr. John Taylor (Loughborough), Dr. Sinclair (Hereford), and Mr. Kirby (Southport). Immediately after the chimes had finished playing at the hour, M. Denyn electrified his listeners with a tremendous shower of sounds, brilliant bravura passages which were nothing more nor less than a toccata so skilfully treated as to lead into the first item of the programme without one being scarcely aware of the fact.

The following is the complete programme:

1. Marche patriotique ... .. Gevaert.
2. Two English songs ... .. Haydn.
- * 3. { Andante ... .. Schumann.
- { 'The joyful peasant' ... .. Mendelssohn.
- { A Christmas piece ... ..
4. Flemish songs:
  - 'Haesken' ... .. Opsomer.
  - 'Klein Moederken' ... .. Candaël.
  - 'Ballade de Genevieve de Brabant' ... ..
- * 5. March of Israelites ... .. Costa.
- * 6. Third Sonata ... .. Nicolai.
7. Huntsmen's Chorus ... .. Weber.

God save the King.

* By request.

It is hardly necessary to say that in all these items Denyn's absolute mastery of his instrument was very apparent. Piano, forte, crescendo, diminuendo, cantabile passages, rapid diatonic and chromatic scales were all rendered with consummate ease and artistic finish. The two best items were undoubtedly the Flemish songs and the Sonata of Nicolai, both being the type of music best suited to the instrument.

It was a most delightful recital, and the large audience—scattered about in all kinds of nooks and corners—were enraptured.

On Friday, M. Denyn journeyed to Loughborough to give a recital on the carillon recently erected by Messrs. Taylor in a tower at their foundry. This is the first of the kind cast by an English founder, and contains thirty-seven bells (three octaves chromatic) with clavier (manuals and pedals). The largest bell weighs only 7 cwt., as one of the principal objects of the founders was to show how minutely accurate it is possible to tune even the smallest bells—a branch of bell-founding in which Messrs. Taylor are pre-eminent. It is not too much to say that the carillon at Loughborough is the most accurately-tuned set of small bells in Europe. It will interest readers to know that it is the small bells that present the greatest difficulties to bell-tuners.

A very large audience was present, and the programme, a fine one, contained nothing but pieces particularly effective upon the instrument and carefully selected by the recitalist:

1. Artevelde's March ... .. Gevaert.
2. 'The British Grenadiers' ... ..
3. Flemish songs :
     { 'The rose of the valley' ... .. Volckerick.
     { 'The blacksmith's song' ... .. Andelhof.
4. Huntsmen's Chorus ... .. Weber.
5. 'La Parisienne' March ... ..
6. Improvisation ... ..
7. 'Byllyed' (Song of Victory), from 'Groenige' ... .. Mestdagh.
8. The National Anthems of England and Belgium.

Every item was greeted with rounds of applause, and when M. Denyn came down from the tower he received a great ovation.

After the recital a visit was paid to the belfry of the parish church, and the foreign visitors were very delighted with the skill shown in the hanging and ringing of bells according to the method peculiar to England.

The proceedings of the day terminated with a banquet given in honour of M. Denyn. Many interested in bells were present, amongst whom may be mentioned Dr. Borms, M. Reverchon (Paris), editor of Revue Internationale d'Horlogerie; Rev. R. P. Stickland (Cattistock); Mr. W. W. Starmer (Tunbridge Wells); Rev. Canon Pitts, &c.

Mr. Starmer associated himself with the toast of the evening—the health of M. Denyn—and said that to have taken part in the proceedings of that day was one of the greatest pleasures he had ever experienced. He had heard M. Denyn play at Malines and elsewhere, but never in his life had he played with greater success than at Loughborough. There was a reason for this, and to him (the speaker) it seemed to arise, from the fact that the beauty of tone and accuracy of tune of the bells inspired the player. (Applause.) M. Denyn had expressed himself in the highest terms of admiration for the change ringing at the parish church. He was surprised at the skill displayed by the ringers and the great ease with which the bells were rung, and said that there was nothing in any other country which could compare with the engineering skill by which this facility had been obtained. This was a red-letter day in the history of bells in our own country, and he felt sure augured well for future development. They all welcomed M. Denyn that evening as an artist, musician and virtuoso, and as one of the finest exponents of the music of bells. He (Mr. Starmer) would be encouraged to pursue with renewed vigour the campaign he had strenuously persevered in for the past twenty years in the interest of bells and bell music.

M. Denyn, who replied in French, said he should never forget the splendid manner in which he had been received, and could scarcely find words which would adequately express his gratitude and appreciation. The carillon at Messrs. Taylor's foundry was composed of the most harmonious bells he had ever heard. The harmony of tones they had there discovered was a symbol of the harmony of hearts which bound them as friends. He hoped to have the pleasure of coming many times to Loughborough to see that model foundry of Messrs. Taylor—second to none in the whole of Europe.

TRAINING COURSES FOR MUSIC TEACHERS.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

As briefly announced in our August issue, the Academy is signaling its removal (now effected) to the new premises in Marylebone Road by organizing a special course of training for teachers. The course has been instituted to meet the increased and increasing demands made upon teachers in these days, and will, it is hoped, enable persons already advanced as performers to obtain that special equipment which is now being recognised as essential to the proper and adequate discharge of the duties of a teacher. It has been designed with the further object of showing the extreme importance of general musicianship (comprising ear-training, a knowledge of the methods of dealing with school class-singing, and the practical application of harmony-study) in relation to all work on the instrumental side.

The course will consist of a series of lecture-lessons by specialists in the following subjects:

- (I.) The fundamentals of teaching pianoforte technique and interpretation (elementary and advanced).
  - (II.) Ear-training and sight-singing.
  - (III.) Aural and keyboard harmony-study.
  - (IV.) Musical analysis (including the study of form and of the characteristics of music of various periods).
  - (V.) Class-singing and voice-production for children.
  - (VI.) Elementary psychology as applied to teaching.
- The course will also include one individual lesson per week in pianoforte-playing.

All the above-named lecture-lessons are designed with the primary object of being a training in teaching, and students attending them may from time to time be called upon to give practical demonstration of points specified by the lecturers.

A special teachers' examination, founded on this course, will be held.

Lecture-classes will be given by Mrs. Curwen, Miss Scott-Gardener, Mr. Tobias Matthay and Mr. Oscar Beringer on pianoforte topics, Mr. F. C. Field Hyde will deal with sight-singing and ear-training, Mr. Stewart Macpherson with aural harmony and musical analysis, Mr. James Bates with voice-culture and class-singing for children and Mr. John Adams (Professor of Education in the University of London) with elementary psychology.

The new building in Marylebone Road will be open for the reception of students in September.

MUSIC AT THE THREE-CHOIRS FESTIVALS.

A correspondent writes :

An analysis of the choral works sung at the Festivals of the Three-Choirs since 1895 reveals some curious anomalies, and excites wonder as to why some works are so rarely (or have never hitherto been) performed, whilst others are favoured with repeat performances.

One would suppose that the conditions at these Cathedral Festivals are, if anywhere, ideal for the performance of the unaccompanied motets of Bach, like 'Sing ye to the Lord'; 'Jesu, priceless treasure'; 'The Spirit also helpeth'; 'Come, Jesu, come'; or the noble 'Festival and Commemoration Sentences' of Brahms, Fest- und Gedenk-sprüche (Op. 109, Nos. 1, 2, 3); or the three motets of Cornelius's 'Liebe' cycle ('The surrender of the soul' was done at Worcester in 1905), but with the latter exception, all these works await their first performance at the Festivals of the Three-Choirs; the same being true of César Franck's 'Psalm 150'; Max Reger's 'Psalm 100' and 'Palm Sunday morning'; Schubert's 'Mass in E flat' and Graun's 'Der Tod Jesu'.

In the sixteen Festivals from 1895-1910 Sir C. Hubert H. Parry has been represented chorally fourteen times by eleven works: 'Job', 'The love that casteth out fear', and 'Beyond these voices there is peace,' each having been repeated between 1907-1910. Only once in the past fifteen years have the following been sung: Bach's B minor Mass; Berlioz's 'Te Deum'; Walford Davies's 'Everyman'; César Franck's 'Beatitudes'; Verdi's 'Stabat Mater' and 'Te Deum'; Dvorák's 'Te Deum'; Brahms's 'Song of Destiny'; Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul'; Schütz's 'Lamentatio'; Leonardo Leo's 'Dixit Dominus'; Beethoven's 'Mass in C'; Spohr's 'Last Judgment' has had three performances in five years (1897, 1899, 1901); Goetz's innocuous setting of Psalm 137 was sung in 1896 and again in 1910. Has Haverall Brian's setting of this 'By Babylon's wave' psalm (performed at the Musical League in Liverpool, September, 1909) ever been considered?

Verdi's 'Requiem' has been sung in 1896, 1900, 1901, 1907, 1910 (on the last three occasions at Gloucester); to some minds this will perhaps be the most startling feature in a review of this period. Beethoven's 'Choral' Symphony had never been performed before 1900, when it was given at Hereford (it is in this year's Worcester scheme), yet Brewer's 'Emmaus,' produced in 1901 at Gloucester, was repeated there in 1907, and Gloucester is still waiting to hear 'No. 9.'

Considering the comparative restriction imposed upon the conductors in the choice of music, by the necessity of the performances being in the various cathedrals, it does seem somewhat strange that the score of works named should have been heard so infrequently, or not at all.

In choosing the items for a 'festival' programme, is it not truer to-day than ever it was, that to include 'something for all tastes' is to pursue a false ideal? Is it not better that the programmes should be characteristic of musical art as it now stands, by giving only the most typically excellent of the newer compositions, and as regards the older ones, only those upon which it is felt that contemporary genius has been more particularly nourished?

BRADFORD AND DISTRICT ORGANISTS' ASSOCIATION AT RIPON.

MR. MOODY ON 'THE ORGANIST AND MODERN MUSIC.'

On July 22, the Bradford and District Organists' Association visited Ripon and Studley. After a stay in Studley Park, and an inspection of the beautiful memorial church of St. Mary the Virgin, they came to the Cathedral, and were received by Mr. Moody, the organist who, after detailing some of the architectural features of the edifice, gave a short recital on the organ, including in his programme Max Reger's Suite, Op. 92, Bossi's Pastorale, Basil Harwood's 'Requiem Æternam,' Salome's Gothic March, and concluding with Bach's Fugue in A minor.

At the close of the recital there was a short interval for tea, after which the members met in the Cathedral Hall. Mr. Moody gave an address on :

'THE ORGANIST AND MODERN MUSIC.'

He said :

If it be once admitted that music had its origin in the religious feelings which from earliest times have animated the human mind, it will be hardly disputed that there is a close relationship between music and the Church, and in a secondary sense between Church music and musicians in general. We organists are of the high priesthood of John Sebastian Bach. Our ministry is the care and nourishment of music, the soul and voice of the fabric of the church. A retrospect of the great composers witnesses that not a few of them were primarily organists. Among these Bach, first and foremost, fixed a contrapuntal standard which has hardly been approached by his successors; while Tallis, Byrde, Purcell, Gibbons, and others exercised an influence on native music which cannot be over-estimated. The church inspired the oratorio and the motet, and from the same source came the madrigal and the glee. But in spite of the amazing development of the organ, and the consequent advance in organ technique, we well may ask ourselves if the art of the organist, on the creative side, is keeping pace with modern progress.

The organ itself has never in its history occupied a position as exalted as it does to-day. We know that in the halcyon days of choral music, when the instrumental output was of a very low order, organ music was most advanced, and in the words of Sir Hubert Parry, the nearest to complete emancipation and independence. That comparatively ancient standard has steadily matured, and we may confidently say that the best organ music of modern times bears favourable comparison with any which has been or is being produced for voices or orchestra. It is true that the music of Wely, Batiste, Scotson-Clarke, and others now living whose names I need not mention, has had, and still has, its noxious influence. Against this we have the noble works of Rheinberger, Widor, Franck, Stanford, Harwood, and last, but in many ways greatest of all, of Max Reger, works which not only have raised the importance of the organ to a higher point than it has in the whole of its history attained, but have made demands on the technique of the organist which could not fail to increase his efficiency, and enhance his prestige as an artist. Reger is doing for the organ what Wagner did for the orchestra.

Nor must we forget Elgar's association with the organ. In his earlier days he was organist of a church in Worcester, and I have heard him speak of the delight he found in listening to music in the Cathedral of his native city. Other eminent musicians are turning their attention to the organ, and as a result demands are being made on the resources of modern organists of which our forbears little dreamed.

THE ORGANIST'S GENERAL CULTURE.

These demands bring us face to face with the question, 'Is a knowledge of music, unaccompanied by a knowledge of the sister arts, sufficient equipment for the task before us?' If you concede what is to me beyond contention, namely, that the organ with all its magnificent possibilities, is to be, after the orchestra, the greatest vehicle of future musical thought, you must admit that in the aggregate we are ill-prepared. We are confronted with this anomaly. While music itself is the most sublime of the arts, the most refining in its influence, the great body of men who represent it are not infrequently unversed in the arts of painting, architecture, and literature. Speaking candidly, the musical profession is in the main on a lower level than that on which rightly it should be placed. I know I am on dangerous ground, but I feel very strongly that if music is to claim the respect to which she is rightly entitled, her natural guardians must be men of culture. I do not mean men who have only the culture of the schools. I mean men who realise that they must have more than a nodding acquaintance with art in all its forms. We may find inspiration in a beautiful picture. Architecture presents unmistakable analogies. There are lessons in the satires of Voltaire no less than in the philosophy of Plato. The organist who wishes to keep pace with the times must read. It is no part of my duty to suggest what he shall read, but if his interpretation of the prevalent tone-poem is to be convincing, he will make himself familiar with the best poets, and where a definite 'programme' is set out by the composer he will first of all analyse and assimilate the incidental colouring.

ACCOMPANIMENT.

This brings us to a consideration of the art of accompaniment, perhaps the greatest pitfall which awaits the organist. There is always the temptation to musically reproduce the thunder and the waterpipes, the wild boar, and the grinning dog. Tricks like these are out of date, and the organist who employs them is obsolete. The poetry of the Psalms, surely the most beautiful feature of the church's liturgy, must be fully realised, but it must be done by legitimate means and not exaggeration. Excessive use of the 16-ft. pedal should be avoided. Chords should be put down firmly, and never in arpeggio fashion. Preliminary pedal notes, and also introductory treble 'leads' should be severely tabooed, and at the end of a movement the notes should be lifted simultaneously. Frequent use of manual doubles confuses harmonic progression. When the pedal coupler is employed it should take effect with and not after the commencement of a phrase. Alterations of stops should not be made in the middle of a passage. The Great Organ should sometimes be used without the Swell coupler. Four-part harmony in hymns and chants is purer than handfuls of chords. Delightful effects in accompaniment are obtained by occasionally playing in two parts with contrasted colours. Chords played an octave higher on the softest 8-ft. stops afford welcome relief in the course of a long Psalm. Sinister effects are produced by playing an octave lower on an 8-ft. Swell reed.

THE CHOIR.

Many of these experiments can be made only where there is a good choir, but I believe that any body of singers can be made self-reliant, and I have small respect for any choir which is entirely dependent on musical accompaniment. The organ has too long been regarded as a background, or as a mere support for the voices, while its real function is, or should be, to add artistic interest to the work in which its co-operation is invoked. The responsibility of the organist and choir-master was never as great as it is in these early decades of the twentieth century. The competitive movement, which has its disadvantages as well as its advantages, has at least set a standard of choral technique, a standard below which no choir, least of all our Cathedral and leading Church choirs, can afford to fall. The day is not so far behind when some of our Cathedrals might have been mistaken for homes of rest for the vocally infirm. A few of them convey the same impression to-day, but generally speaking the work of our Cathedral choirs is infinitely better than it was twenty years ago. And rightly so. The old slovenliness of attack, careless diction, absence of good phrasing and general apathy are faults no longer to be tolerated. We may not be able to realise the finest points in musical art, but we shall be all the better for aiming at them. Some of us are spending our best years in the pursuit of ideals which local conditions make almost impossible of attainment. But if these ideals are to be submerged because circumstances are adverse, we are hardly worthy of our position.

THE CHOICE OF MUSIC.

The average organist, and perhaps more particularly the average Cathedral organist, is always in danger of falling into a rut. Tradition requires the latter to assist in the performance of a considerable amount of music which should long since have been consigned to the dust heap.

I have the greatest veneration for the accepted classics of choral literature, but I do regret the inclusion of meretricious music, which occasionally finds its way into our lists almost solely because it is to hand, and because it enables us to avoid undue repetition. Surely, it would be infinitely better to repeat, again and again, during the year, that which is best. I look forward to the day when there shall be a great witenagemote of our leading organists and preceptors to deal with this important question. The problem is by no means parochial; it is universal, and it is our duty to purge the Church of the sickly rubbish which has crept in.

IMPROVISATION.

In conclusion, I would put in a strong plea for a deeper study of the neglected art of improvisation. By this I do not mean the aimless meandering chords which too frequently pass for improvisation. Still less do I mean a slavish adherence to rhythmic division and set forms. By all means have a central idea, but do not make the mistake of riding it to death. It is in this direction that many organists fail to convey the all-important idea of spontaneity. I am sure there must be a large number of amateur organists who do not invariably begin their extemporisation in four parts, with a 16-ft. pedal coupled, but I can truthfully say I never met one! Much of course depends on the acoustic properties of your church, but delightful results are to be obtained from purely manual efforts, and these occasionally in less than four parts. Aim at the cultivation of horizontal harmony, and when you improvise your introductory voluntaries never forget that it is in your hands to create the right atmosphere, and that the effect of worship and supplication is either enhanced or diminished by your own musical thought and its expression. Above all, be sure that your music will never be wholly good if you have cultivated it to the utter exclusion of the other arts. Here as elsewhere unity makes for strength, and such unity as this will help you fully to appreciate the beauties of modern composition, and to maintain the dignity and grandeur of the great classical school.

Church and Organ Music.

THE ORGANIST AND MODERN MUSIC.

By W. G. ALCOCK.

The paper read recently by Mr. C. H. Moody, organist of Ripon Cathedral, before the Bradford and District Organists' Association, is reported on the preceding pages. The chief points raised were the attitude of the organist towards the development of music, and the artistic ideals towards which he should strive. In admirable diction he put before his critical audience the various steps by which the edifice of our Church and Organ Music has been built, and, as showing his optimistic views, claimed that after the orchestra, the organ offers the greatest attraction to modern composers. In support of this he quotes Rheinberger, Widor, Franck, Stanford, Harwood and Reger. He might have added Karg-Elert, and several English names. We almost share the claim, and yet hope to be fully converted. There is no doubt a 'new learning' in organ matters, and with such enthusiasm as Mr. Moody's and many of our younger men, the time cannot be distant when the organ shall, by reason of its artistic construction and the really fine works of art which it has called—and is more frequently calling—into being, take its legitimate place as a fitting vehicle of high and noble thought. We are entirely with Mr. Moody in deploring the wealth (!) of fifth-rate sentimentality which dazzles the average recital audience. No doubt, so long as they have these things offered them will they flock to hear them, and think themselves edified. The real test may be found in the fact that such recitals as those to which we refer invariably leave the audience wondering at the skill of the performer rather than at the music itself. We do not for one moment cavil at the organ arrangement. We must have it, and it might with truth be said that more than one example sounds better on the organ than on the orchestra or pianoforte. A case may be found in the Rachmaninoff Prelude in C minor, which, while certainly sounding great on the pianoforte, is simply mighty on an organ and in a building both of adequate dimensions.

We cannot see with Mr. Moody that it is necessary, if an organist is to become a 'musician,' he must be to some extent versed in the arts of painting, architecture and literature. It would no doubt be an advantage to him to possess some such knowledge. But if the contention be sound, the converse ought to hold good, and students of those other arts should be to some extent versed in music. It is strange that so many painters (for instance) are not musical, and that yet their art does not suffer. We willingly grant the necessity for general culture, and regret to have to agree with Mr. Moody that organists are in the aggregate ill-prepared, and that, frankly, the musical profession is, in the main, on a lower level than it should deserve. We also concur in the argument that music is the most sublime of all the arts. Indeed, it has always seemed to us that no other art can present the sublime thoughts of which music is capable. If an artist paint a landscape, he is only idealising something he has seen. Architecture can only lend to music its qualities of form and proportion. If a sculptor carve a statue, he must have seen features in human life (to take the highest model) to stimulate his fancy. Literature no doubt is more like music in its suggestiveness of the unseen, but music far transcends all in its uplifting power, and most vividly 'brings all heaven before our eyes.' We agree, also, that the organist is often too ignorant of questions entirely outside the realms of his profession and its artistic attributes, such as the matters which govern our social system. He is generally an 'organiac,' and can seldom talk of anything but his organ. The time, too, surely has gone when the long hair and Trilby hat, or the top hat and frock coat necessarily constitute the working clothes of the organist. Mr. Moody's plea for general culture will be shared by all who realise the power of organ music, and it is evident that in this respect a steady improvement is taking place. Our older Universities now insist on residence for music graduates, and though there have no doubt been many exceptions, the wisdom of this step is shown by the fact that the average music graduate of the past can hardly have been considered a well-read man. There is another aspect of the question not touched upon in Mr. Moody's paper. The scandalous under-payment musicians are forced to accept must be held responsible for many of our shortcomings. It is difficult indeed to live decently, and there is little time for anything but hard work. But that is an old, old story, and had better be only hinted at.

There were many noteworthy suggestions in Mr. Moody's address, touching the various directions in which the organist's artistic instincts might work. We have before said in these pages that the organ-loft seems to have been the home of so much that is inartistic, and the suggestions to which we refer were all excellent, and such as can only raise the standard of accompaniment in Church.

Extemporising, too, received attention, and the importance of its cultivation was insisted upon.

Altogether, Mr. Moody's paper seems to crystallise the many thoughts such a subject suggests; and his large audience, composed as it was of serious and thinking men, full of enthusiasm for their art, must have found much to ponder over. Enough to say we are the better for having read it.

The organ at the Coronation Exhibition upon which recitals are being given, is the work of Mr. Rest Cartwright, of the Park Road Works, West Green, N., and represents the greater part of the instrument built to the order of St. Ignatius, Stamford Hill. It contains three complete manuals and pedal organ, with the necessary couplers, pneumatic pistons, and other accessories. The total number of pipes at present is 2,150, and the wind is supplied (through five independent bellows and reservoirs at 6 and 3½ inches pressure) by a 'Discus' blower and motor. The latter have been kindly lent and fitted up by Messrs. Watkins & Watson, prior to their installation at the church.

The organ at Emmanuel Congregational Church, Cambridge, originally (1880) built by Willis, has lately been rebuilt and enlarged by Messrs. Norman & Beard. A Choir organ has been added, and the tonal scheme of the Great organ considerably re-arranged and enlarged. A feature is the addition of a pedal trombone and bass flute. Curiously enough, the organ is the only specimen of Willis's work possessed by Cambridge. The opening service took place on Sunday, June 11, when recitals were given by Mr. J. H. Warmington (who for over twenty years has been organist of the church) and Dr. A. H. Mann.

We have received an interesting letter from a correspondent in Outremont, Montreal, drawing attention to the work of Mr. Percival J. Illsley, organist and choirmaster of St. George's Church, Montreal. When appointed twenty-one years ago, he landed to find the city in its primitive condition, but has now the satisfaction of holding a foremost position in what has become one of Canada's finest cities. From the report sent us, we gladly note his excellent work, which includes that of an organist, recitalist and choirmaster. His choir, we are told, is held in high estimation, and from the répertoire it is evident that excellent work has been done. Mr. Illsley was formerly a pupil at Lichfield Cathedral, under Mr. J. B. Lott.

At Calcutta, on July 10, the Lord Bishop of Calcutta, acting for his Grace The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, conferred upon Mr. Ernest Slater, organist and choirmaster of Calcutta Cathedral, the degree of Doctor of Music. Dr. Slater was presented by the Hon. Mr. Justice Carduff, C.S.I., reading the petition, the signatories of which included Lord Hardinge, Viceroy of India, the Right Rev. The Bishop of Calcutta, the Hon. Sir Lawrence Jenkins, K.C.I.E., Chief Justice of Bengal, and other prominent officials. Dr. Slater has been organist of Calcutta Cathedral for over twenty-five years.

Coronation services were held in Calcutta in the Cathedral, and in the churches of St. John and St. Andrew, and in the Roman Catholic Cathedral. At the English services the music included (at the Cathedral) Dr. Slater's setting of the anthems 'I was glad' and 'All the kings of the earth shall praise Thee,' 'Zadok the priest,' and the Coronation Anthem; at St. John's Church, Sir Frederick Bridge's Homage Anthem, and Henry Smart's Te Deum in F. At St. Andrew's a feature was the singing of Dr. Slater's anthem 'O Heavenly King, by whose decree,' the service concluding with the National Anthem.

At St. Matthew's Church, Northampton, a selection of early seventeenth-century music was given on July 23. The examples included Gibbons's Te Deum in F and the anthems 'Almighty and everlasting God' and 'Hosanna to the Son of David,' and Allegri's 'Miserere,' while the instrumental numbers were a Prelude by Dr. John Bull, a Capriccio (Soprano La, Sol, Fa, Mi, Re, Ut) and a Canzona, both by Frescobaldi. An interesting feature was the performance, in their original notation, of familiar hymn tunes, these including 'Dundee,' 'Passion Chorale' (Hassler), 'St. David' (Ravenscroft), 'Angels' (Gibbons), 'London New' (Newtoun) and many others. Mr. Charles J. King, organist of the church, played the organ, which is well-known as one of Messrs. Walker's finest instruments. Similar services will be given in September, and later some attention will be devoted to works by Purcell, Humphrey, Blow, Buxtehude and others.

At Knox Church, Dunedin, New Zealand, on June 22, last, a Coronation Recital was given by Mr. W. Paget Gale, organist of the Church, and Mr. David Cooke, organist of Moray Place Congregational Church, assisted by the combined choirs of the two churches named. The solo vocalist was Miss Florence Pacey, and the programme included

Sir Edward Elgar's arrangement of the National Anthem (soloist, Miss Duthie), Handel's 'Zadok,' Weber's 'Jubilee' Overture, Elgar's 'Land of hope and glory,' Meyerbeer's, Tchaikovsky's and German's Coronation Marches, and 'Elgar's Imperial March. The recital concluded with the 'Hallelujah' chorus.

Mr. W. J. Pletts, who for thirty years has been a tenor singer in the choir of St. Peter's, Newcastle, received a testimonial on July 9 on the occasion of his retirement.

It should have been stated (August No., p. 526) that Mr. C. H. Moody (Ripon) played the organ at the meeting of the North-Eastern Choral Association at York.

Mr. E. H. Lemare has recently been giving organ recitals at the Glasgow Exhibition before crowded and enthusiastic audiences.

PASSED FELLOWSHIP, JULY 1911.

The following candidates were successful in the examination held in July for the Fellowship of the Royal College of Organists:

E. C. Austin (London).
E. W. Baker (Bishop's Stortford).
P. E. Clarke (Wellington).
W. J. Comley (London).
Miss E. P. Coxeter (Hastings).
R. J. Foort (London).
D. G. A. Fox (Teddington).
H. J. L. Gresham (London).
E. N. Hay, Mus. B. (Portsmouth).
J. E. Hope, Mus. B. (London).
N. C. Jephcott (Coventry).
E. L. Lodge (Wallasey).
W. H. London (Berkhamsted).
C. B. Maude (Lingfield).

H. S. Middleton (Windsor).
H. N. Oakes (Bewdley).
C. J. Parsons (Wells).
H. G. Perry (Ponders End).
A. W. Pollitt, Mus. Doc. (Liverpool).
C. Richmond (Sharrow).
E. Ritchings (Blackburn).
Miss E. F. Salisbury (Marlborough).
W. Singleton (Golcar).
J. D. Smith (Deal).
F. H. Stamper (London).
R. J. Stannard (London).
A. S. Warrell (Bristol).

The Lafontaine prize was won by D. G. A. Fox and the E. H. Turpin prize by N. C. Jephcott.

Reviews.

Unfigured Harmony. By Percy C. Buck, Mus. Doc.

[Clarendon Press.]

Academic circles have shown a tardy recognition of the fact that the real teaching of harmony begins where the employment of figured basses ceases. It is obvious that the study of harmony is useful in proportion as it prepares the student to encounter the problems met with in actual composition, and the first of these is the harmonizing of melodies. At present, however, the supply of text-book guidance on the subject is unequal to the demand. The issue of Professor Buck's book is therefore timely; moreover it is the kind of book one would welcome even in an over-stocked market. The author knows from his own teaching experience that the most exemplary collection of maxims, however elaborate, incontestably true and beautifully expressed, is apt to leave the pupil a little wiser perhaps, but with little more practical ability than before. Professor Buck has penetrated the student mind, knows the misconceptions of which it is capable, and counters them at every point with his practical hints and with his plentiful examples of the right way and the wrong way of doing things. The wealth of illustrations, fruitful of instruction, is one of the best features of the book. He writes primarily for the examination candidate, as can be seen from the attention he devotes to problems peculiar to the examination room. Yet he attaches as much importance to a sense of style and musicianship as to correctness and ingenuity. For instance, in treating of imitation he says:

'Most students waste an incalculable amount of ingenuity in the attempt to produce exact imitation. So far is this, even when accomplished, from being desirable, that the student may call himself a musician at once when he realises the true nature of imitation. For reproduction and imitation are two words with distinctly different meanings. To find that a tune will go in an exact canon, or that the bass can reproduce some little phrase with all intervals precisely similar—this is not musicianship, but mere exploration and discovery. Music begins when, feeling that imitation is the artistic necessity at a given point, one alters the unimportant details of the model while preserving the essentials.'

The book is in five sections, which are devoted to Modulation, Harmonization of melodies, Unfigured basses, Inner melodies and continued canons, and Ground basses. Under the first heading the author gives advice that should for ever arm the intelligent reader to meet with confidence and success the familiar trier 'continue for eight bars in the style suggested by the following, modulating through the keys of . . . . .'. The remarks on harmonization are again a complete armoury against the common faults and stumbling-blocks that no
